Those who oppose the treaties allege that to do so would be an act of national cowardice, allowing our southern neighbors, in effect, to kick sand in our faces.

Mr. President, Panama is about the size of South Carolina, with a population equal to the city of Atlanta. Without casting aspersions on the valor of the Panamanian Guardia Nacional, I submit to my colleagues that they do not pose a threat to the defense forces of the United States. Reasonable people are not apt to suppose that we are letting ourselves be pushed around by Panama.

So much of the argument about why we should keep the canal is based upon perceived historical rights and privileges which belong to the United States as a result of our involvement in this undertaking at the start of the century. The historical record on this point demands closer scrutiny, especially when some Americans believe we are being euchred or pressured out of something to which we have a strong legislative and historical right. So let us consider how we got involved in Panama in the first place.

Since the 16th century, the value of a canal in the Central American Isthmus was recognized. By the turn of the 20th century, when the United States got around to thinking seriously about building one, there was a question about where to put it—in Nicaragua or in Panama, which was a Province of Colombia. A private French group, the French Canal Co., already owned the rights to construct a canal across Panama. The French company offered to sell its interests in the area to the United States for over $100 million. Because of the price, we decided to build in Nicaragua.

Since their franchise was to expire in 1903, the French company saw the wisdom of lowering its asking price to $40 million so they could get their money out of the deal.

These arrangements were negotiated by a French agent, named Phillippe Bunau-Varilla, who had been the chief engineer on the French project.

The combination of a more reasonable price, plus a volcanic eruption in Nicaragua, convinced our Secretary of State to negotiate a treaty with the Colombian Ambassador in Washington which permitted us to build a canal in Panama and to have perpetual control over a strip of land extending for 3 miles on either side of the canal. For that, we agreed to pay Colombia $10 million, plus an annual fee of $250,000.

The U.S. Senate ratified this treaty. The Government of Colombia rejected it. It is understandable that they might have wondered why we were willing to buy out the French company for $40 million, and yet were only willing to pay Colombia $10 million for the perpetual use of their country.

The Roosevelt administration put pressure on Colombia to accept the treaty, without success. When Colombia offered to negotiate, the President refused. He called Colombians, "inefficient bandits," and made known, in private, and very widely, his view that it would help to uncomplicate things if Panama were an independent state. In short order, the American press was full of stories to the effect that the United States would smile favorably upon a revolution in Panama.

In the draft of his state of the Union address in 1903, the President recommended a takeover of Panama. This was deleted from his address, however, because his private messages had already been received loud and clear. On November 3, a revolution broke out in Panama. There had been other revolutions there. The country had once been independent and, in 1821, opted to become part of Colombia. It then spent the better part of the rest of the century trying to regain its independence through revolutions, rebellions, and other expressions of dissatisfaction. But the 1903 revolution was different. That one was financed and organized out of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City, and one of the principals in the effort was none other than Phillippe Bunau-Varilla; still looking for an angle to get back the French Canal Company's investment.

The United States intervened in the revolution in an interesting way. In 1846, we had concluded an agreement with Colombia by which we would mutually act to guarantee the right of transit across Panama and to keep law and order there. Now, acting under that agreement, we prevented Colombia herself from putting down the revolution in her own territory.

Three days after the revolution began, we recognized the new Republic of Panama. The new government, in turn, signed a treaty giving us the canal rights we hold today, for $10 million plus an annual fee. And who do you think negotiated the treaty for Panama? Our old friend, and the newly appointed representative from Panama in Washington—Phillippe Bunau-Varilla, the agent for the French Canal Co., which, when all was said and done, finally got its $40 million out of the deal.

Our dealings with the French Canal Co., the involvement of U.S. political figures like Mark Hanna, the questions of who got paid for what, and how the money moved, are all matters which are still largely shrouded in secrecy. Roosevelt later wrote that what had occurred, had been done "in accordance with the highest, finest, and nicest standards of public and government ethics." That is difficult to substantiate from the record. Some years later, Teddy came closer to the apparent truth when he boasted, "I took the Canal Zone."

If there is any cause for pride in these events, it exists in the fact that many Americans at the time were ashamed of what had been done and protested it.

In 1921, our Government indemnified Colombia to the tune of $25 million for our role in the so-called revolution which got us the Panama Canal Zone.

I do not think it is unpatriotic to say this episode does not constitute a shining, golden moment in American history. There is only so much that can be undone. Obviously, Panama is not going to go back under Colombian control. However, legitimate or illegitimate her birth or her rebirth, she exists—a sovereign state—the youngest republic in the Americas. And part of her sovereignty was signed away for profit by a French agent for a French corporation, with the connivance of American politicians. From the standpoint of the Panamanians, one does not have to be a raving Communist to object to the U.S. presence there.

This is why I question the constant vaporizing effusions about pride in our involvement in Panama. We can be proud of the technological achievement. We can be proud of the organizational achievement. However, we do not need the Panama Canal as an eternal monument to our technological and organizational abilities. These are fully acknowledged and respected around the world.

I would rather see the Panama Canal established as a testament to our strength, our self-confidence and our essential fairness—and that will be done by restoring to Panama the rights that were signed away by Mr. Bunau-Varilla 75 years ago.

Just in recounting the events of our involvement in that part of South America, it certainly has to bring to mind some of our involvement of recent years, involvement that we now, in many formal ways are rejecting. Yet, for some reason or other, we still want to continue this last vestige of our one colonialist experience.

The "fatal flaw" in these treaties pointed out by many opponents is the potential crippling effect they would have on our national defense and security.

Before we begin conjuring up the ghost of the domino theory in Latin America or fantasizing about Soviet and American ships queuing up to transit the canal enroute to lambast each other's targets, let us recognize the essential fact that the military exigencies of 1978 are a far cry from those of 1903.

Many of us find it hard to convince our colleagues in this Nation that the exigencies of 1978 are far different from those after World War II. Certainly, no one will deny the change that has taken place since 1903.

One inspiration for our involvement in the canal in the first place was the fact that it took 69 days for one of our battleships to come around Cape Horn from the Phillipines to Cuba during the Spanish American War.

Today—we have large fleets in the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Today—the speed of our vessels is twice or three times what it was at the turn of the century.

Today—we have naval vessels which will not even fit through the canal.

I can think of nothing easier than putting the canal out of commission today, should an enemy choose to do so.

I can think of no more inviting target for a belligerent than a string of U.S. warships threading its way helplessly through the canal.

I can think of no better way to tie up substantial U.S. forces than to draw them into the Canal Zone in a futile and debilitating effort to keep the canal open in the face of a hostile populace.

Let me stop at that argument, because it is used in a threatening way by those who are opponents of the treaty. Allusion to the fact that the populace would be hostile is used to imply unacceptable blackmail. Would we be hostile if there were an enclave owned by some foreign nation in any one of our constituencies? I would imagine so. So why is it not factual to state that such a hostility would exist? And why deem it unusual or a blackmail tactic?

The defense arguments over the canal suffer from one central and internal contradiction. Any war sufficient in magnitude to make the canal a strategic necessity would almost certainly be one which would make it a strategic liability.

I do not want to live with the tactics of 1903 in 1978. I do not want to live in 1978 with the conceptions of a world that existed in 1903.

There are those who would concentrate all their efforts, both in a diplomatic and a military sense, in the Far East, in the Middle East, in Africa, totally in disregard of that area of the world closest to us. This is our first priority: The Western Hemisphere, South America, Central America, the Caribbean.

We are a free people. It is a freedom which we believe in, which we perpetuate, and which, as every day goes by, we try to give greater meaning to. Why, then, a reversal of that attitude on the international scene as it applies to our closest neighbors?

In the military sense it is proper to turn to those who are the experts. Here the Commander in Chief and the Pentagon are satisfied. Our Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of Defense, who were involved in negotiations on a day-to-day basis, have endorsed the treaties. Those who are opposed are the former Chiefs of Staff, the former admirals, the former generals. It is not the "former" in whose hands I expect to put my life or the lives of my children. It is those who have that responsibility today and into the future. They have spoken clearly on the point that is of greatest concern, and properly so, to all of us—national security.

The only refutation of their testimony has been that they are pressured to support the treaties, and I think that is an insult against men of honor and character and intelligence.

Believe me, we are wise in the ways of Washington. If somebody wants to have their feelings known, they will have them known, if not before Senatorial committees, then through the media. So those who have the expertise, in a military sense, have spoken and are unqualifiedly for the treaties.

They have said they are not interested in ownership but, rather, in the use of the canal and that use has been guaranteed in the national security sense.

Another specter commonly raised is that of a Soviet enclave being established in Panama as a result of a return of the canal. I should like to address that issue, in response to some of the comments made by opponents of the treaty which comments imply a soft on communism result from treaty ratification.

First of all, let us understand that the opponents of the treaty in Panama are those political parties that are to the left of the Communist Party. They are all opposed to the treaty. The Communist Party of Panama is opposed in part to the treaty, specifically that part of the treaty which says that the United States has the right to guarantee the neutrality of the canal. They want the United States out entirely. Why are these leftist elements against the treaty? Because as long as the present situation exists, it is the climate in which they thrive.

So as to this shooting from the hip, such as comments of Torrijos being a Marxist dictator—that he is not—and we are giving something away to radical elements on the left, the exact reverse is the truth. If you were on the far left in Panama and committed to violence, believe me, you would want the present state of facts to continue; 1903 treaties is the climate in which violence occurs.

What is the Soviet experience in the Western Hemisphere to date? Obviously, the most prominent one that comes to mind is their close association with Cuba. What is the result of that association? Cuba is an economic liability to Russia, which we should see as a plus. What she—Cuba—gets out of the deal is the opportunity to send her sons to die in dubious battles on behalf of the Soviet Union in Africa and the Middle East and, yes, in South America.

I do not think the success of either the Soviet Union or Cuba has been outstanding in any respect. The dismal example of Cuba is probably the best insurance we can have against serious flirtation by any nation in the Western Hemisphere with the Soviet Union.

Now, it seems to this Senator that much of the resistance to the Panama Canal Treaties is found not so much in the prospective liabilities of the agreements but in their value as a political and a philosophical rallying point.

From the onset of the Republican primaries in 1976, we have watched the Panama Canal come around and around and around, with the colorless monotony of a carousel carrying only one horse.

With the broad and rich vein of social, economic, and political concerns which American conservatives could and should mine in redressing the political imbalance of America, it is saddening to me that no issue more compelling than Panama is chosen as the banner beneath which to assemble. It argues a lack of imagination, creativity, intellectual sensibility, and political sensitivity in the section of the ideological spectrum upon which we must rely to keep balance in our national politics.

If any one of us went to any street in America today and inquired as to what the principal issues of concern were, we certainly would get energy, we certainly would get the response of inflation, and we certainly would get the response of employment—of employment opportunity, of education. This is what should be addressed by all philosophies and all parties.

But instead there are those who look upon this as their moment of opportunity. I think it is a moment of opportunity in the national sense—in the sense of making it clear what it is this country stands for.

For too long America's words have had to stand alone, without the activism or the deeds behind them which give meaning to those words.

We have been through an orgy of celebration as to what it is this Nation has stood for over the course of 200 years and now the time has come, it seems to me, to write our own chapters in terms of our own lives and our own experiences. This is what is important, 1976 was never as important as 1977 and beyond.

This is the moment when we decide for ourselves and for our children what the definition of "strength" will be. This is our moment when we bring practical, useful glory to the concepts of America. This is our chance to leave a rather bleak period of history behind and to win that real battle for men's minds which is taking place.

If Cuba and those that follow the Soviet banner take their sons to war and leave them dying in foreign lands, let that be their testimony. If the United States does not compromise its great principles abroad but keeps them as pure and as whole as we insist for ourselves, let that be our testimony. Yes, nations of the world look to us, but in order to retain their gaze we better have a picture worth looking at.

I remember when the world laughed at us through our constitutional processes we put our own house in order. It was a world that had come to accept cynicism, corruption, in some measure or another as a necessary part of governing. It was only the great strength of this Nation that made stick, idealism being important, integrity being important. And the world that laughed at us, nation by nation came to accept the principles which we established. We did that not by force of arms but by virtue of what we stood for and what we stood for being right.

We are a free people in a free land. Why should we wish anything less for anyone else anywhere else? Not some diluted or modified version of democracy but exactly what we expect for ourselves.

Our strength as a Nation is derived from the spiritual commitment which we have made to human freedom and national self-determination.

The United States does not have the population to be the greatest nation in the world. It is not there. Figure it out yourself. It is probably what, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, down the population totem pole. We do not have the land mass to be the greatest nation in the world. It is not there. These are not matters of speculation or conjecture. They are matters of fact. We are not No. 1 in natural resources in the world. So we do not have the population, we do not have the land mass, we do not have the natural resources.

Just how is it that we became No. 1? What did we draw upon? What was it that brought us to our present state of affairs? Sometimes I think we forget the origins of our national greatness. It is because we had something inside, some spirit that had us perform way beyond our capacity as measured by traditional yardsticks.

And the minute this Nation is willing to compromise or sell off a little bit of that spirit or a few of those principles our days are numbered as being the greatest nation in the world.

No, not freedom, in its full essence, for every American and not for somebody beyond our boundaries. We have been through that exercise.

We did not defend real estate in the great confrontations of the past by this Nation. We defended principles, and we fought for them. That spiritual commitment to freedom, to self-determination; American lives defended those commitments from Yorktown to Normandy, to Selma, Ala. I tell you that those who would have us deny Panama's legitimate right to be master of its own house give away far more than a canal; they compromise our basic strength.

The difficulty for many on this floor is that when jobs are spoken of and polls taken, ditto inflation, taxes, homeownership, education, these are the tangibles, these are what human beings easily relate to. It is the grist of politics. It is the subject matter of the poll taker. But how do you make anybody realize the importance of the American spirit? It is not an easy job politically. It is not something correctly asked as the right question in a poll. And yet without it, I think we are a very small nation indeed.

But because it is important many on this floor are going to stand up and do something quite contrary to what seems to be in their best political interests.

The real essence of this job, or rather the trust of this job, has nothing to do with politics. It has a great deal to do with a nation and its future.

The relationship we have maintained with Panama, under the terms of the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty is a bad advertisement for American democracy. It is a horrible advertisement. It perpetuates a memory of our one unfortunate brush with imperialism, and, very frankly, provides a propaganda platform for those who want to degrade us before the world. Most importantly, it blurs what should be for the peoples of the world a crystal-clear distinction between the American and Soviet systems as manifested in foreign policy.

The United States was never meant to be a democratic rerun of the colonialism of the European monarchs or the totalitarianism of Communist central committees.

The treaties before us dispel once and for all the impression that this democracy, idealistically and outspokenly committed human freedom and national self-determination, could perpetuate a state of affairs for the people of Panama which it would not tolerate for its own.

Mr. President, today, in 1978, the emerging nations of Latin America and the world are testing the values of democracy and totalitarianism by how each system lives up to its ideals at home and honors them abroad. With the growth of freedom at stake, our words had better match our deeds.

We must as a people put aside the concept that a nation's strength is measured only in its armaments, its GNP or its natural resources.

What good are any of these things without a committed people, without a motivated people? Like all of you, most of my colleagues on this floor, anyway those of my age or older, whenever we saw versions of the Star-Spangled Banner, they inevitably were illustrated with both flamboyant and gory battle scenes of the American Revolution; meant to exemplify patriotism. I commend to each of you an illustrated version of the Star-Spangled Banner by Peters Speir which differs from the traditional version. Illustrating the first words of our national anthem there are the traditional paintings of the bombardment of Fort McHenry with which we are all familiar; but then when it gets to the second stanza, discussing our strength, there are pictures of combines in a wheatfield, of scientists in a laboratory, men on the moon, bulldozers in an urban area. This is the strength of the United States of America also. Not exactly what I was taught, any more than this experience with Panama is what I was taught; but it is the truth, and it is as much this Nation as our military prowess. Indeed it should be more so if we are to prevail in the future.

I started off with the words, and I will end with them—I cannot think of any better—"right makes might." That is why this treaty is going to pass this Chamber. No one can doubt or will ever doubt the technological superiority of the United States of America. I want this occasion, though, to be a superior first step on the march to our next centennial.

What is it that my generation and the generations of my children and grandchildren will have stood for? And did we have the guts to take our stand when it meant something? Not years and years from now, when obviously the circumstances or the times would make the treaty an easy choice—and it will be so; you know that as well as I do.

Our battle today is against vestiges of the past. We are going to have a treaty. But why not do it when it is a test of character, when it means something to vote "aye"?

Like anything else, you can measure the success in terms of the gamble. There is a great prize at stake here for the United States and for the principles that we stand for in this battle for men's minds across the world and in our own hemisphere.

Ours is a decent nation. Ours is a fair nation, and ours is a nation that has the courage to make both those traits stick. That is the United States I remember. That is the one worth dying for.

Again, not using my words, but in the words of James Russell Lowell:

Then it is the brave man chooses
While the coward stands aside,
Till the multitude makes virtue
Of the faith they have denied.

The name of the song: "Once to Every Man and Nation."

There will not be many more times in our lifetime when we have such an opportunity. The words, the principles of the Constitution of the United States have not changed. And now comes that test of our ability to take those words and act them out. It is not easy at home, or abroad. Recently, one of our colleagues recently died, and no man more thoroughly used a lifetime to try to make America's words come true. To a large degree he stood alone. While observing Hubert Humphrey's funeral the other day, I could only think to myself that if someone really wanted to pay a tribute to Hubert Humphrey, maybe a few of those who made it because of Hubert Humphrey, could pay tribute to the man by standing alone for someone else. That would be a real tribute.

About a year ago—in making a high school commencement address, I told the graduating class:

I could wish nothing better for each of you than that once in your lifetime you would stand alone on behalf of somebody or something.

If the millions of people in this country would do that all at the same time, that would define the United States of America. It would be a strength nobody could lick. We would have recovered from some dim years in our recent past. Once again, we would be the strongest Nation in the world.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Connecticut for a very eloquent statement, and particularly for understanding that these treaties give the United States an opportunity to stand for something.

The Senator referred to Senator Humphrey. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed in the Record at this point the statement which Senator Humphrey submitted to the committee when we were considering the treaties. He felt so strongly that these treaties represented an opportunity for the United States along the lines on which the Senator from Connecticut has spoken so eloquently that he was motivated to submit a special statement to the committee. I have asked unanimous consent that that statement be printed in the Record at this point because it follows along so closely with the eloquent statement which the Senator from Connecticut has made.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

I have followed this issue very carefully and discussed the treaties with the President by telephone. I have pledged to the President my full and active support for the treaties. An important goal of these negotiations has been the establishment of a modern and mutually acceptable treaty relationship between the United States and Panama which provides for the efficient operation of the important waterway that will continue to remain open to all the world's shipping.

This has been the bipartisan goal for four Presidents, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter, who above all others have the responsibility for the national security of our country. The United States has lost nothing through these treaties. We have not given up anything. Clearly, no international relationship negotiated more than 70 years ago can be expected to last forever without adjustment.

In sum, the new treaties, based on partnership, give the United States the rights we need to restore the crucial ingredient of Panamanian consent and strengthens our mutual interest in a well-run and secure canal. The viability of any treaty depends on the underlying consent and shared interests of nations who are party to it.

Panama and our Latin American neighbors long have been dissatisfied with the 1903 treaty. This declining level of consent transcends any one government and now encompasses Panamanians of all strata.

There are some who claim that the proposed treaties will have an adverse effect on our security. However, the Panama Canal issue affects our relationships with other Latin American nations who view it as a test case of whether or not the United States will move into a more mature relationship with our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere.

Senate approval of the treaties will add substance and character to the good neighbor policy first enunciated by President Roosevelt.

The U.S. image and its leadership ability are under careful scrutiny around the world. Some Americans express concern that our national prestige would be diminished by the new treaties.

But in my view the case is just the opposite. The 1903 treaty is viewed abroad as one-sided and anachronistic, a holdover from a colonial era which other nations have discarded.

The ability of the United States to work through this emotion-fraught issue at home through ratification of the treaties in the Senate will be viewed abroad by friend and foe alike as a sign that we can make necessary accommodations to a changing world.

In essence, a new treaty relationship based on the concept of partnership and similar to other agreements with our allies throughout the world offers a tool that will better protect our basic interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. Hodges]. Under the previous order, the Chair recognizes at this time the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Presiding Officer. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga) be recognized at this time without prejudice to me under the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga) is recognized.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Panama Canal treaties now pending for ratification by this august body.

I support the treaties, because in my judgment, it would be disastrous for both Panama and the United States if the Senate did not ratify them. In trying to decide the issue before us, we must bear in mind, first and foremost, that the canal is worthless to us unless it can be kept in operation and we are able to use it.

The question then arises: In the event that the U.S. Senate rejects the treaties, and hostilities between Panama and the United States should ensue, could we adequately defend the canal and keep it in use?

In search of an answer, I went to Panama 3 months ago with the distinguished Senate majority leader, Robert Byrd, and five other Senators. While I was there, I inspected the canal. I took a helicopter tour of the Canal Zone, and I visited a remote island Province of Panama, I talked with Americans who live in the Canal Zone and with those who live in Panama proper, with American military and business leaders, with Panamanian leaders, including Gen. Omar Torrijos and President Demetrio Lakas, and with Panamanians who voted for and others who voted against the treaties in their plebiscite of last October.

My firsthand observation of the situation in Panama convinced me that Gen. George Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was right when he said that in the event of hostilities between the United States and Panama, we could not adequately defend the canal and keep it in use, even with 100,000 troops. General Brown, of course, was speaking in the realistic expectation of guerrilla-type hostilities.

As a former infantry officer, while helicoptering over the canal and viewing the dense tropical jungle extending for miles, right up to the canal on both sides, I came to the conclusion that any determined band of guerrillas could keep the canal completely shut down over extended periods of time and render it useless in the event of an emergency.

I was convinced, as were the other visiting Senators that the operation of the canal would be indefensible in the event of hostilities between the United States and Panama, as distinguished of course, from hostilities between any other nation and the combined defense forces of Panama and the United States. The manmade freshwater lakes that supply the canal's water, its complex lock system, and its electric power supply are just too, too vulnerable.

A single breach in the Lake Gatun Dam, the canal's major water source, would close down the canal for as long as 2 years, the time it would take rainfall to refill the lake. The sinking of a ship in the lock system—which would be technically easy to accomplish—would bring canal operations to a halt for a long period of time.

We are living in a world where terrorism runs rampant. And it will not take much terrorism to close the Panama Canal. Justifiably, ship owners themselves would refuse to sail their ships through the canal so long as a real threat to their safety prevails.

The new treaties are the best guarantee—in fact, the only guarantee—we have to avoid hostilities and to keep the canal open for our unobstructed use.

Every businessman in the United States should be aware of how the closing of the Panama Canal would affect U.S. trade. Every American should know that such closing would adversely affect his or her daily living and the security of this country.

Because the new, bigger ships, including supertankers carrying Alaskan petroleum to gulf or east coast refineries, cannot fit into the canal, the canal is becoming less crucial to our trade with the passage of time. However, 16 percent of American trade still goes through the canal. By comparison the percentage of U.S. intercoastal trade passing through the canal in 1924 was as much as 50 percent. Similarly, 1,265 U.S. military vessels went through the canal in 1949; in 1976 only 85 made the same journey.

America needs to use the canal. And there is every reason to expect that we will be able to continue using it freely—if we ratify the treaties.

There is a further need for ratification of the treaties, ratification would set right what is unquestionably an ugly chapter in American history. An examination of the events leading up to the signing of the 1903 treaty, under which we now operate the canal, supports this judgment.

Up until 1903, Panama was a Province of Colombia. The United States had sought a treaty to construct the canal with Colombia, the country that owned the land. The treaty was negotiated. But the Colombian Senate refused to approve it.

A Frenchman, Philippe Bunau-Varilla was the chief engineer for the French company that had gone bankrupt trying to build the canal.

Bunau-Varilla, who was a great entrepreneur, talked the United States into sponsoring a Panamanian revolution against Colombia—in exchange for the right to build and operate the canal.

Bunau-Varilla, the Frenchman, planned the revolution, literally wrote the original Panama Canal Treaty of 1903, and even signed the treaty for Panama on November 18, 1903, all before the official Panamanian delegation arrived in Washington to begin negotiations. What is even more incredible is that no Panamanian had even seen the treaty before it was signed by the Frenchman and our own Secretary of State.

Theodore Roosevelt, who was then President, took credit for the revolution and extended official American recognition of the new State of Panama within 3 days after the revolution. The hastily drawn treaty was signed by Secretary of State Hay for the United States on November 18, 1903, only 15 days after the revolution.

Here is what Bunau-Varilla told Secretary Hay just before the treaty was signed:

For two years you have had difficulties in negotiating the Canal Treaty with the Colombians. Remember that (at that time) the Panamanians were still Colombians. You have now before you a Frenchman * * * do it now!

Secretary Hay said the treaty was “vastly advantageous to the United States, and we must confess, not so advantageous to Panama.” Bunau-Varilla made one thing certain—that included in the new treaty, just as it was in the proposed treaty rejected by Colombia, was a provision for the payment of $40,000,000 by the United States to the French for equipment and materials used in the unsuccessful digging of the canal by the French.

You can easily appreciate why many Panamanians did not like the treaty from the very beginning. In 1936 and 1955, the Panamanians persuaded the United States to make minor changes in the treaty for their benefit. In 1958, riots broke out in Panama when nationalists attempted to raise the Panamanian flag over the canal. Several Panamanians were killed in the incident.

In 1963, in an effort to calm the situation, we began flying both our flag and the Panamanian flag over the Canal Zone. But there were more riots. Finally in 1964, after 20 Panamanians and 4 Americans were killed, we consented to renegotiate the treaty. That renegotiation took 13 years, and was supported by the two Democratic and two Republican Presidents who served during that period.

Mr. President, in trying to decide whether to support the new treaties or not, we need also to try to understand the Panamanians' point of view. In our dialog with the Panamanians in November of last year, we visited Americans were told that what they want most is to regain their “national dignity.” They are hurt by the fact that a foreign nation has complete control over their greatest national resource and primary means of transportation through their country.

The United States operates the canal and controls a strip of land 10 miles wide that runs completely across the middle of Panama. The Panamanians feel that only with the return of the Canal Zone to their control will they be able to express genuine pride in their country and walk with dignity as citizens of the Republic of Panama.

That is why they rioted in 1959 and 1964. That is why they pushed so hard for renegotiation of the treaty of 1903. That is why they support the new treaties overwhelmingly.

In fact, all of Latin America resents the old 1903 treaty. Ratifying the new treaties would be a major step, indeed, in improving our international relationships in our own hemisphere.

Let us now take a brief but close look at the objections which have been raised against the treaties.

The opponents of the treaties have said, "We bought (the canal) and paid for it. It is ours just as much as the Louisiana Purchase and Alaska are ours". They call the canal our sovereign territory.

The truth of the matter is that we do not own the canal. We never did. We are only leaseholders, highly privileged as we may be.

The 1903 treaty, under which we currently operate, says we are given the "use" of the Canal Zone. It does not say we own it. It, in fact, states that "the sovereignty of such territory (is) vested in the Republic of Panama." The United States is only given authority as "if it were the sovereign." The language of the 1903 treaty makes is unmistakably clear that the United States is not the sovereign, Panama is.

For the use of the canal and Canal Zone, we have been paying an annual rental fee to Panama. Until 1935, the fee was $225,000 a year. For 16 years thereafter, we paid $1.9 million annually. We now pay $2.3 million a year.

Evidence in other areas points to our own recognition that we do not own the canal. For one thing, under our Federal Constitution, any person born on American soil is automatically an American citizen, regardless of parentage. However, a person born of non-American parents within the Canal Zone is not a citizen of the United States. Some of my colleagues may be aware of the fact that when the State of Hawaii was a Territory of the United States, a person born of alien parents in Hawaii automatically became a U.S. citizen. That is the basis of my own precious U.S. citizenship. This is not the case in the Canal Zone.

In addition, the Canal Zone's ports are considered foreign ports for postal mail purposes, and goods shipped from the United States to the Canal Zone are considered a part of foreign trade.

Opponents of the treaties are saying the treaties propose a "give-away" of the canal. We certainly cannot give away something that is not ours.

The opponents of the treaties have also argued that they should not be ratified because they were signed by General Torrijos, a tinhorn dictator who cannot be depended upon.

General Torrijos may be a dictator—but he certainly is not a stereotypical dictator. He has the unmistakable support of his people, and walks among them even without bodyguards or arms. I know because I was with him on a couple of his walks. And he does not use terror and torture to govern. In fact, after signing the pending treaties, he sought and obtained, by a two-thirds majority vote, their ratification by his people through a plebiscite, overseen by United Nations observers.

Panamanians may not enjoy the same civil rights we Americans do, but their government under Torrijos does not systematically deny them their rights.

It is important to look, not only at Torrijos' failings but at his accomplishments—not only what he has not done, but what he has done.

As a tinhorn dictator, Torrijos has done exceedingly well by his people. Since he came to power in 1968, he has doubled the number of schools. He has improved marketing facilities for small farmers, and built hydroelectric plants. And he has instituted a low-cost housing program for the poor in urban and rural areas.

And he plans to do more. As part of the treaty agreements, we have promised $50 million in foreign sales credits to Panama over the next 10 years. General Torrijos told our delegation of Senators that he does not plan to spend this money for weapons. He will use it to send promising young Panamanians to college and to make them bilingual and trilingual so they can take over the complex operations of the canal in the year 2000. And he plans to buy helicopters and train pilots in each province of Panama to provide emergency medical aid.

Critics of the treaties have floated the rumor that General Torrijos is a Communist and that he plans to lead his country to communism.

I see no reason to believe that there is any truth to the rumor. When I was in Panama, I spoke to a cross section of American residents and Panamanians. None of them believed Torrijos is a Communist.

During one of our conferences, General Torrijos was asked whether he might turn the canal over to Cuba or Russia once the treaties were ratified. His response was that he did not want to see "Panamanian waters infested by Communist sharks."

At another time, he told us he had strong feelings about the issue. He said:

If I tried to lead my people to communism," they would throw me out, and if, despite my position on this issue, the people would take up communism, I would leave this country!"

The President of Panama, Texas-educated Demetrio Lakas, who talks and acts like a Texan, is well known for his anti-Communist position. When asked about Torrijos, he said he was sure Torrijos was not a Communist and he would be willing to stake his life on it.

Consider this fact, too, that under Torrijos' leadership Panama has not even recognized the Soviet Union or the People's Republic of China. No diplomatic relations exist between Panama and the two foremost Communist nations. The truth of the matter is that we are on friendlier official relations with the Communist nations than is the Republic of Panama.

Despite the controversy over the treaties, my trip to Panama convinced me that the people of Panama are fond of Americans. And they tend to follow American leadership.

As a matter of fact, many of the present leaders of Panama are American educated, including General Torrijos.

Having said this about communism and the people's leanings in Panama, I do not want to leave the impression that there is absolutely no danger of a Communist takeover. There is.

I believe that a negative vote by the U.S. Senate on the pending treaties would be the greatest possible boost for communism in Panama. The enormous frustration that the Panamanians would feel would help the Communists convince them that the United States is an imperialist nation, bent on exploiting weaker nations.

Right now the Communists are the only ones in Panama working against the treaties. Their one issue will disappear when the treaties are ratified. Our voting down the treaties would give the Panamanian Communists new life.

Let me turn now to another argument frequently raised against the treaties—the lack of human rights in Panama. Basically, this issue is not relevant to the treaties, except in the use of the treaties to win concessions from Torrijos, which we have.

During our final meeting with Torrijos in Panama last November, we urged him to repeal the law that permits detention, without due process of law, of persons accused of committing a crime, political or otherwise. He said he would discuss the matter with his advisory council, and only a few weeks later he announced its repeal. He also promised to allow more freedom for the Panamanian press. And he assured us he would allow political exiles to return home after the treaties have been ratified. I am confident, after having met the man, that he will keep those promises, too.

These are major concessions. He made them because he wants us to approve the treaties. In fact, he even said that he would be willing to resign from his present leadership position if such action would help in getting the U.S. Senate to ratify the treaties.

It should be noted, too, that Amnesty International, the organization which recently won the Nobel Peace Prize for its human rights work, was not sufficiently concerned about the human rights situation in Panama to mount an effort there. There were more human rights problems in other Latin American countries. And Amnesty International found few prisoner violations in their investigation in Panama.

Amnesty International did find political exile violations. But, as I mentioned earlier, General Torrijos promised Senator Byrd and the other visiting Senators that he would allow those exiles to return to Panama after the treaties have been ratified. He fears that prior return would create open agitation against the treaties led by these returnees.

Another criticism lodged against the treaties is that we would be paying the Panamanians millions of American taxpayers' dollars to take the canal off our hands. It is just not so.

During the period that we continue to operate the canal, toll rates will be increased to make up for the added payments. We should be paying in fact, additional sums for the maintenance of military bases that we now maintain in Panama, and if we continue to maintain them, just as we do in Greece, Spain, Turkey, and the Philippines. The truth of the matter is that we have not paid Panama a cent for use of our military bases there in 74 years.

We will be setting up a package of loans, loan guarantees, and credits for Panama. But most of these will promote trade and investment by American companies there, and the loans will be paid to the U.S. Government.

The one legitimate question that has come up since the canal treaties were signed is a military one: Does the United States have a right to intervene militarily if the neutrality of the canal is threatened? To clarify the language of article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, President Carter and General Torrijos agreed to a "Statement of Understanding" that the United States will, indeed, have that right. Also, the statement of understanding assures us that our ships will have the right to "go to the head of the line" in an emergency.

I personally believe that these two issues are dealt with adequately in the neutrality treaties as signed. However, I realize that many of my colleagues do not share this view. I have, therefore, joined as a cosponsor of amendments 20 and 21, which would incorporate into articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty the exact language contained in the statement of understanding. Inasmuch as 78 Senators are listed as cosponsors of these amendments, their adoption is assured. The one legitimate objection which then can be raised against the treaties will be removed, and every Senator should be able to vote for ratification of the treaties with a clear conscience.

There is no denying that there is something in us as a nation that wants to stand up and say, "We've had enough. We're not going to be pushed around by anyone any more. Let's have no more Vietnams."

We want to take pride in the greatness and strength of our country—indeed, the greatest and strongest in the world.

But we must remember that above all greatness and strength is the will to do that which is right.

We may not be ecstatic over the proposed Panama Canal treaties. But we need to bear in mind that we can either ratify the treaties, and guarantee our right to use the canal, or we can vote them down and thereby virtually guarantee open warfare in the Canal Zone and the shutting down of the canal.

We may not like the choice between these two alternatives. But they are the only alternatives.

I am not saying that the existing treaty of 1903 is not valid. It is. But we must recognize that it smells of long-dead colonialism, as has been pointed out by many who have preceded me on the floor.

Since we signed and ratified that treaty, many changes have occurred in the world. We must change with the times or pay the consequences.

To summarize:

First and foremost, we need to keep the canal open.

Second, in our own good interest, we need to be concerned about how other nations see us. We need to be on good terms with the people of Panama. And we need to get going on a new good-neighbor policy in Latin America.

Third, and even more important, we need to be concerned about how we see our own selves.

This great country of ours was born of a revolution for the right to self-determination. We have fought for other peoples' right to self-determination. Let us not deny that same right to the Panamanians and try to understand that their yearning for self-determination and national dignity cannot too long be contained.

The understanding which is demanded of us now is the spirit of liberty that was once described by Judge Learned Hand as follows:

The spirit of liberty is the spirit which is not too sure that it is right; the spirit of liberty is the spirit which seeks to understand the mind of other men and women; the spirit of liberty is the spirit which weighs their interests alongside its own . . .

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to vote to ratify the Panama Canal treaties so we who proudly call ourselves Americans may prove to the world that we are indeed dedicated to the true spirit of liberty.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Hawaii yield?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Maryland (Mr. Sarbanes).

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I thank and commend the distinguished Senator from Hawaii for his eloquent statement. He has taken a keen interest in this issue and has dealt with it in a reasoned, logical, and perceptive manner which has contributed greatly to the debate.

I particularly want to underscore one of his concluding points; namely, that the treaties involve the basic issue of how we see ourselves as a people; namely, our own self-perceptions. This is enormously important, because it is my view that the willingness of the American people to use our might to protect our interests is closely tied to their perception that that might is being exercised in harmony with right—in other words, that we are proceeding according to principles which command the respect of our own people. These treaties offer us the opportunity to have the legal and moral basis upon which to rest an exercise of our power if we have to take action in order to protect our interests.

Therefore, I think the point that the distinguished Senator from Hawaii has made so well is enormously important. The treaties address in a very fundamental and constructive way how the American people perceive themselves and what we stand for as a nation, and how we are prepared as a nation to use our power to protect our interests.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Senator from Maryland (Mr. Sarbanes) for his generous comments. He was one of those of us who went to Panama last November, and I must say that he contributed a great deal to the conferences we held with Panamanians, including General Torrijos and President Lakas.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a comment?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Illinois (Mr. Percy).

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga) has rendered a valuable service this afternoon. He not only has spoken eloquently and shown his depth of feeling, but also, he has put out some very hard facts. It is really facts, rather than emotion, with which we must deal.

During my 8 days back in Illinois, I took a poll, generally at the beginning of a discussion with various groups I was attending, as to how they feel about the canal. We spent about a half hour discussing those involved alternatives, putting the question right back to them: "If it is rejected out of hand, are you willing to pay the consequences? What alternative do we have?"

I was always encouraged by the fact that at the end of the discussion, the sentiment had changed, the mood had changed, the hand vote actually changed. And I think that is borne out by the Gallup Poll that indicates that the more people know about it, the more they tend to realize that we have been working for 14 years in an inevitable direction of finding a way to modify these treaties so that they will endure for another 75 or 100 years, and that is really what we are engaged in. Of all the 96 witnesses we had before the Foreign Relations Committee, I did not find a single witness who said we could cling to the 1903 treaties any longer.

I would like to just comment further on one particular point brought out by my distinguished colleague from Hawaii, in which he said that in 75 years or so we have never paid a penny to Panama for the use of those bases there. Consider the importance of the Panama Canal in World War I and World War II. I had someone in Illinois the other day say he was based in Panama and American soldiers were so deep they almost stood shoulder to shoulder down there protecting the canal because we realized the necessity of having that canal open. It was because of the friendliness of the Panamanians and their cooperation that we had the degree of security that we had. Even today, after several negotiated increases, we still pay less than 1 percent of the total revenue that the Panama Canal Company receives to Panama as rent for the rights that we lease from them, and it is clear that we do not have sovereignty; we lease these rights.

We will be paying an average of $35 million per year to Spain for base rights. I have not heard a single American challenge that or question my judgment or the judgment of the administration in supporting that.

Why, then, would we question paying out of toll revenue in the future $40 million for the right, as my distinguished colleague has said so eloquently, to cut a path, a ditch, right straight through the middle of their country, so that not even the Chief of State of Panama can fly over it by helicopter from north to south or south to north without getting permission before he does so?

I think you can get it right down to dollars and cents. I do not think this is going to be solved and we will discuss later some of the economic factors, and I will be very pleased to address myself to those issues in greater length later. I do not think that is going to be the crucial thing but certainly we are not paying Panama to take the canal off our hands. That was so misunderstood back at the beginning of my discussions back in Illinois 8 days ago. I hope by now it is much better understood. There are some costs involved of course, but not payments to Panama. We do not pay Panama for base rights for the next 22 years. Not a penny from the U.S. Treasury is paid to Panama for the use of bases, for huge bases, that for 22 years we will operate down there, when we without question are paying money from the Treasury to Greece, Turkey, Spain, many other countries for base rights. Why, then, should we resent so much the fact that Panama will be paid an increased rent or revenue as a result of a negotiating process in which some very, very hardheaded negotiators have done the best they can? But obviously if you drive so hard a bargain as to be grossly unfair, you get dissatisfaction. And we have had dissatisfaction for 75 years with an agreement that our own Secretary of State John Hay said any patriot would object to. Our majority leader eloquently made the point, and I quoted him many times this past week, that not a single Panamanian signed the 1903 treaty. A Frenchman signed it and he did a good job for France, but not certainly for Panama.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Senator from Illinois (Mr. Percy) for his comments. Relative to the amount that we have been paid it should be pointed out—I do not think that this has been brought out clearly as yet—last year we collected in tolls the sum of $165 million. The year before it was $135 million. So we had increased by $30 million in the course of a year. And it is expected that this toll may remain stable or increase in the future. So as to what the Senator from Illinois pointed out, even if we did pay up to $40 million or $60 million the total revenues would still exceed the amount by $120 million to $140 million.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. Hodges) such time as he may require with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Hearing no objection, the Chair recognizes the distinguished junior Senator from Arkansas (Mr. Hodges).

Mr. HODGES. Mr. President, the greatness of the United States does not lie in our material possessions, whether it be unequalled military might, an unparalleled material standard of living, or a magnificent canal. It lies in our democratic ideals as written in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. These ideals are only as meaningful as our national translation of them into acts. Specifically, how as a nation do we treat these less powerful, less blessed, less free? Or, to use my simplistic and perhaps naive query—is it right? Harry Truman has become very popular of late; I suggest if you like to read of Harry Truman, as I do, you will love to read Abraham Lincoln. His speech on September 11, 1858, at Edwardsville, Ill., is particularly appropriate:

What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling sea coasts, our army and our navy. These are not our reliance against tyranny. All of those may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defence is in the spirit which prized liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seeds of despotism at your own doors. Familiarize yourselves with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you.

Our Nation under the existing treaty can keep forever the canal—but is it right? We can militarily defend the canal against Panama or any other nation if the treaties are not ratified—but is it right? We can eventually overcome the adverse reaction in Latin and South America sure to be created if we turn down the treaties—but is it right?

There are those who question our national resolve and spirit if we fail to “stand up” to Panama. It is argued that to ratify the treaties is further evidence of our national impotence and erosion of resolve that began in Vietnam. I think just the opposite is true. Real character and strength are measured more by how the strong treat the weak, the large the small, the rich the poor, than by false notions of character or a distorted sense of pride. Our Nation will be no less powerful or great after the treaties are ratified. Indeed, I am convinced that to ratify the treaties will show clearly the greatness of the United States and reflect clearly the real compassion and charity of our people. The touchstone of democracy is essential fairness to all people. Abraham Lincoln taught this spirit in his address to the Indiana Regiment when he said:

As I would not be a slave, so I would not be a master. This expresses my idea of democracy. What ever differs from this, to the extent of the difference, is no democracy.

I reject out of hand and without further comment in my State, who label treaty proponents traitors. Tactics using unfounded fear and smear have no place in a free and open debate.

We as Americans should understand and be sensitive to the desires of the people of Panama to have control over their own territory. We carved our nation out of the claims of others. The Panama Canal Zone is a 10-mile wide strip sitting squarely in the middle of their country, separating one side from another. The greatest natural resource of Panama, the canal, is leased to us in perpetuity. We control the single most important strip of land in their country. I can see that it is a psychological tourniquet cutting off circulation and damaging their national pride. I just reread the Declaration of Independence.

Although my thoughts are speculative and presumptuous, I am convinced from reading its language and knowing its history that the signers would understand and empathize with the desires of the people of Panama to make whole and independent their country.

Approval of the treaties is not without its risks. We are a nation of laws dealing with Panama with a government basically of one man. Omar Torrijos is a dictator, and from my brief encounter I have no sense of confidence in him. There is the possibility of a change in leadership bringing about a substantial change in Panama.

Also, I have reservations about the economic stability of the canal. It is a brilliantly designed, engineered, and constructed system, but it is old and requires expensive maintenance. I have no doubts as to the ability of the Panamanians to maintain the canal. I do question whether individual leaders will have the resolve and economic discipline to put the required great amounts of money into the operation.

The critical time obviously is the year 2000, when we will not longer have a physical presence in Panama. Under the neutrality treaty as amended we clearly have the right to take military action to insure neutrality generally and in particular our use of the canal. The safeguard is there, but it could require a military commitment and thereby potential loss to guarantee the right. That concerns me.

Thus, there are important and weighty reasons which give rise to legitimate questions about the adequacy of the treaties. But there are also grave risks in defending the treaties. That the Panama Canal has become an emotional symbol to many in the United States is evident. But this is even more intense in Latin America and the "third world." It is viewed there as indicative of the way a powerful and large nation treats a smaller, less powerful neighbor. Our rejection of the treaties will be difficult for them to understand. They will not hear our talk of equality, democracy and hemispheric cooperation because of the noise of our contrary actions. Democratic ideals are far more persuasive as embodied in actions than simply in print or word.

I have been assured by our military intelligence people, in briefings, part of which were classified, that the Communist influence in Panama is negligible. There are accusations to the contrary, but I find no evidence to support those contentions. Indeed, our failure to ratify the treaties will create fertile soil for communism, giving some proof to the accusation of U.S. imperialism.

Our military leaders on active duty are in favor of the treaties. Those whose duty it is to defend the canal state unequivocally that under the treaties, viewed from a military perspective, they can in fact guarantee the use of the canal to all. The most powerful nation in the world can, and I trust will, use that might to insure that which is right—neutral access to the Panama Canal.

I am particularly sensitive to the fact that I was not elected, nor will I be subject to a vote of the people of Arkansas in the future. Thus, the ordinary checks and balances on a political figure by the ballot box do not apply to me. I am acutely aware of the opposition of many Arkansans to these treaties, whose opinion I respect. It has made this an agonizing decision.

I can only assure them that I have carefully and completely weighed all the arguments. I have read and listened extensively. I went to Panama and there was exposed to all viewpoints, pro and con. Thus, I have not arrived at my decision quickly or capriciously. This is an issue that has merit on both sides. Simply stated, the interest of our Nation is served in using the canal, and these treaties with the two principal amendments proposed by the joint leadership guarantee as well as possible its use. I consider this decision to be similar to most hard choices in life in that it involves a balancing of concerns and competing interests, with the final result not a clear black or white, but gray. After sorting out the intellectual and emotional arguments on both sides, a single concept is most persuasive—to ratify the amended treaties is the right thing to do. In the final analysis I have to do what I think is right for the United States, but even more important, the right thing to do as I in my conscience believe it to be.

I would say also that those who strongly oppose these treaties in this Senate in my judgment do so also out of conscience and conviction. I do not detect nor have I heard mentioned any partisan or political motive. These are men I respect greatly. The fact that we reach different conclusions does not foreclose men of good faith, judgment and conscience coming to a different conclusion.

There are broader concerns and questions underlying this discussion of the specific issue of the Panama Canal treaties. I have decided how to cast my vote on the Panama Canal treaties in this broader context, and after weighing the merits on both sides come to the conclusion that I should cast my vote for ratification of the Panama Canal treaties with the two principal amendments as suggested by our leadership.

I thank the Senator for yielding this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Arkansas in his decision, which has been very thoughtfully and courageously arrived at. I know he has struggled long with his conscience about this matter; I have talked with him on a number of occasions about it, and I know that he has weighed the facts and the evidence carefully, and reached a considered decision based upon what he thought to be the merits and the facts.

I also want to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. Matsunaga).

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Hawaii. I come from the sunshiny State.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. What did I say?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Alaska.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Well, I am sorry; I should have said Hawaii. I think that it is evident that while it is the distinguished Senator from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga) to whom I address these compliments, they apply to both of these Senators. Their statements were cogent, unemotional, clear, persuasive, and concise, and I commend both Senators not only for their decisions but also their fine statements.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. West Virginia.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Oh, West Virginia? Well, now we are even.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Senator for his most generous comments, and I would like to take this time to congratulate especially the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. Hodges) for his great maiden speech which he has delivered today on this floor. Luckily for him it was on a major issue—perhaps one of the most important in this century, and, what is most important, I believe he arrived at the right decision and I congratulate the Senator from Arkansas for that great decision, which came to him, as he stated, after great anxiety. Again I congratulate him.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arkansas—from Hawaii.

Mr. President, in my previous remarks during this debate, I have discussed some of the reasons why I believe that these treaties are in the long-term best interests of the United States—our security interests, our economic interests, and our political interests.

I have cited some of the factors that have convinced me that approval of these treaties will enhance our international stature and prestige. These treaties represent the wise and judicious use of power by the most powerful Nation in the world.

I have emphasized that these treaties—with inclusion of the bipartisan amendments on defense rights and priority passage—are, in fact, more protective of our interests than is the existing agreement. The value of the canal is in its use, and that use is best guaranteed by cooperation, not confrontation, with Panama and by good relations with the other nations of this hemisphere.

The new treaties would not only strengthen our security and provide the moral and legal basis for our defense of the canal, but will engender an environment of goodwill and mutual respect.

SOVEREIGNTY

Today, I want to turn to some of the arguments that have been raised against the treaties—arguments that I do not believe will stand up in the face of serious examination.

For example, there is the question of sovereignty in the Canal Zone. This is a matter about which there has been a great deal of misunderstanding.

Stated simply, the United States is not now, and never has been, sovereign in the Canal Zone. It does not own, nor has it ever owned, the Canal Zone.

Article II of the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty grants to the United States the "use, occupation and control" of a zone of land "for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection" of a canal within that zone. The zone was not sold to the United States, it was not ceded, conveyed or granted. If it had been, there would have been no need for article II to spell out the particular rights which were being granted to the United States, for all the rights of ownership would obviously have belonged to the United States. There would have been no need for the treaty to state, as it did, that the "use, occupation and control" of the zone was for purposes of constructing a canal. If the land itself, if all sovereignty over it were being transferred to the United States, Panama would have had nothing to say about what we did with the land, or on it.

Clearly, the United States, by article II of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, received certain interests and rights in the Canal Zone. But it did not acquire outright ownership, or sovereignty.

Article III of the 1903 treaty grants to the United States the "rights, power and authority" over the zone which it "would possess . . . if it were the sovereign." That is plain unmistakable English: "rights, power and authority, which it would possess if it were the sovereign." The United States is not sovereign. Panama always retained actual sovereignty. By the 1903 treaty, it granted to the United States the right to exercise sovereignty in furtherance of a particular purpose—the construction and operation of a canal.

To put it briefly, under the 1903 treaty we obtained rights—not land—and we have continued to make annual payments for those rights. Not sovereignty.

Several of my esteemed colleagues, and many who write to me, have compared our status in the Canal Zone to the purchase of the Louisiana Territory, and of Alaska. The contrast could not be more clearcut, and serves to demonstrate that the United States acquired neither territory nor sovereignty in the Canal Zone by virtue of the treaty.

On October 21, 1803, President Thomas Jefferson proclaimed the treaty for the cession of Louisiana. By article I, the First Consul of the French Republic, Napoleon Bonaparte, did "cede to the said United States in the name of the French Republic forever and in full sovereignty the said territory with all its rights of sovereignty which went with it, were transferred, or ceded, to the United States.

The Convention Ceding Alaska, proclaimed on June 20, 1867 by President Andrew Johnson, is similar. By article I, the Emperor of Russia, Alexander II, agreed "to cede to the United States—all the territory and dominion now possessed by his said Majesty on the continent of America and in the adjacent islands."

Both the Louisiana and Alaskan Treaties contain a provision concerning the admission to U.S. citizenship of residents of those territories—a provision which is conspicuous by its absence from the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty. The Louisiana Treaty, for example, provides that—

The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible according to the principles of the Federal Constitution to the enjoyment of all rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States. * * *

The Alaskan Treaty speaks in similar terms.

These provisions establish that the status of these two territories, as contemplated by the signatories to the treaties and the Senators who ratified them, was indeed one of outright possession and dominion—lock, stock and barrel—in contrast to the 1903 Canal Treaty.

The record bears this out. We have, for example, treated the zone as a foreign territory for purposes of customs and mail, and for determining citizenship: children born in the Canal Zone of non-U.S. citizens are not U.S. citizens—as they would be if born in one of the States, the Virgin Islands, Guam.

Numerous statements have been made by U.S. officials which make clear that we have not been sovereign in the zone—beginning with Secretary of State John Hay's declaration in 1904 that Panama retained "titular sovereignty."

The distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. Percy) wanted me to yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN. After the Senator from Illinois has completed, I will ask the distinguished majority leader to yield to me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. All right.

Mr. PERCY. I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding. I would like to ask the majority leader, if we had sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone, would it then be required for the House of Representatives to approve any transfer of such territory or land back to Panama? We have certain rights under the 1903 Treaty, as I understand the situation, which can be changed and altered, but we do not have sovereignty any more than if someone leases a house. His rights are quite different than if he owns title and deed to that house. I think the point is that clearly in the judgment of many of us the House of Representatives is not involved in this.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I believe properties can be transferred by treaty.

I believe they have been transferred by self-executing treaties.

Mr. PERCY. This particular question of ownership, the question of sovereignty and sovereign rights, is so misunderstood in the country. As the distinguished majority leader has pointed out, we have not possessed such sovereign rights, yet a very large part of the American people have believed that we have. That is why they continually ask the question, "Why are we giving away the canal?"

We are not giving away something. You cannot give away something that you do not really, in a sense, own. I think that point must be made, time and time again, to make clear what our rights are.

We do have certain rights. We are renegotiating those rights. But we certainly do not hold sovereignty over the Canal Zone itself. That, I think, must be fully understood by the American people if they are to understand the processes that four administrations have gone through for 14 years of negotiation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The distinguished Senator from Illinois makes the point well and succinctly: One cannot convey that which he does not own.

I yield now to the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

I call the distinguished major leader's attention to page 69 of the digest of information on the proposed Panama Canal treaties prepared for the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers in the hearing held July 22, 1977. If the Senator will not object, I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the Record.

I do make that request, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NOTE. Does not include unrecovered United States' investment in the Canal and Canal facilities except to the extent of $2 million in annuity payments which were capitalized as construction cost during the period of 1913 through 1920. As of October 1, 1977 unrecovered capital investment of the United States in the Panama Canal Company totals $319 million on which interest payments accrue in the approximate amount of $17 million per annum.

Mr. ALLEN. One of the items appearing here is "total payments as a result of the 1903 Treaty." First, "reflected on company books as title and treaty rights:

a. Payment to Republic of Panama, $10 million."

As the distinguished Senator realizes, in 1924, I believe, the United States paid Colombia an additional $25 million.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That was as an indemnity for the loss of Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right, for the loss of the land.

b. Payment to individual property owners (depopulation of Canal Zone)—$3,965,254.

I think the distinguished Senator, if he would investigate a little further, would find that the United States did pay $3,965,254 to individual property owners for title to their land in what is now the Canal Zone.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is talking about apples; I am talking about oranges. The treaty did not convey title. The treaty did not convey sovereignty. Under the treaty, the United States had certain rights and subsequently had to purchase certain property.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I understood the Senator to state categorically, though, that the United States did not own this land in the Canal Zone. Yet the record shows that the U.S. Government paid some $3,965,254 for the title to the property in the Canal Zone.

The next item, is: "Payment to French (land rights)—$326,016."

d. Madden Dam Area land rights from 1924-1932.

They paid $437,619.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The U.S. Government pays money to land-owners over in West Virginia for their land to add to the Monongahela, George Washington, and Thomas Jefferson forests.

Mr. ALLEN. And does that not become U.S. property?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The United States has the right, under the treaties, and in accordance with Panamanian law, to purchase certain properties, but the treaties themselves did not convey sovereignty over that zone.

Mr. ALLEN. I was not talking about sovereignty. I was careful not to. I was disputing the Senator's statement that the United States did not own the land. We are not talking about the statement that they do not have sovereignty. I dispute that, but I do not dispute it at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They do not own the Canal Zone. The United States does not own West Virginia. It does own several thousand acres in the Monongahela National Forest. The United States does claim title to certain lands in the zone, but it does not own the Canal Zone, nor does it claim title in fee simple to all the land in the zone.

Mr. ALLEN. The United States owns the property constituting the Canal Zone, if you want to split hairs to that extent.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator likes to split hairs. I do not care to.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There are many private landowners in Panama today.

Mr. ALLEN. In Panama, but not the Canal Zone.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is generally correct. A few parcels have been transferred to charitable organizations.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Numerous statements have been made by U.S. officials that make it clear that we have not been sovereign in the zone, beginning with Secretary of State John Hay's declaration in 1904 that Panama retained titular sovereignty.

The point I am making, I say to my distinguished friend from Alabama, is that there is a difference in what the treaty of 1903 did with respect to the Panama Canal and the lands and waters there, the rights being granted to the United States to use those lands and waters for the purpose of constructing a canal—there is a difference between that treaty and the treaty that ceded the territory of Alaska to the United States or the treaty that ceded the Louisiana territory to the United States. Sovereignty passed, sovereignty vested in the United States of America in the case of Alaska and in the case of the Louisiana territory; but not in the case of the Panama Canal Zone. This is a distinction with a difference. It is a distinction that American people should understand.

In 1905, William Howard Taft, then Secretary of War, studied the issue and concluded in a report to President Theodore Roosevelt that—

... while we have all the attributes of sovereignty necessary in the construction, maintenance, and protection of the Canal, the very form in which these attributes are conferred in the Treaty seems to preserve the titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the Republic of Panama . . . I can see no reason for creating a resentment on the part of the people of the Isthmus by quarreling over that which is dear to them, but which is to us of no real moment whatever.

Although there are several court cases which lend further weight to this position, there is one case, Wilson against Shaw, which is often cited by those who insist that we do have sovereignty. It is worth noting that, of all the cases cited on the issue of sovereignty in the Zone, this is the oldest case, decided in 1907—7 years before the canal was completed. The issue in Wilson was not sovereignty—but whether the Congress could constitutionally expend public funds to construct the canal. The court held that it could. That holding was consistent with a long line of previous decisions interpreting congressional power under the interstate commerce clause. The decision did not rest upon—in fact, barely touched upon—the issue of sovereignty. The word sovereignty does not appear even once in the Court's opinion, excepting the instance where article III of the treaty itself is quoted—and that without comment.

The narrow limits of the Court's decision in Wilson were pointed out by the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone against Coulson. Referring to the Wilson decision, the Court stated:

The Supreme Court did not hold more in that case (Wilson) than that the United States had the use, occupation and control in perpetuity of the Canal Zone. It is apparent from an examination of the treaty that the United States is not the owner in fee of the Canal Zone, but has the use, occupation and control of the same in perpetuity. * * *

Most of my colleagues are aware, by now, of the Lukenbach Steamship Co. and the Vermilya-Brown, Co., Inc.—because both of these companies were involved in cases which went all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court—and both of these cases did involve the issue of sovereignty.

In the Lukenbach case, decided in 1930, the Court held that, for purposes of construing the mail transportation statute, the ports of Cristobal and Balboa could correctly be treated as “foreign” ports. The Justice Department, in that case, unsuccessfully argued what others are still arguing today, and I quote:

Under the provisions of the treaty between the Republic of Panama and the United States, the cities of Cristobal and Balboa in the Canal Zone are ports of the United States and the waters of the Panama Canal are waters of the United States.

As I have already indicated, the courts said “No.”

The Vermilya-Brown Co., case, decided in 1948, involved the issue of the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the United States over a naval base in Bermuda. In reaching its decision about the applicability of the Fair Labor Standards Act to the base, the Court noted that the Administrator of the Wage-Hour Division had properly issued a statement of general policy to apply the act to the Canal Zone, which, in the Court's own words, is “admittedly territory over which we do not have sovereignty.”

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Mr. President, our thinking about the Panama Canal treaties should not be clouded by misconceptions concerning the locus of sovereignty in the Panama Canal Zone. Opponents of the treaties would have us believe that sovereignty rests with these United States and that under the treaties we are relinquishing our sovereignty. I maintain that we cannot now be accused of giving up what we never had. Opponents of the treaties seek to convince the American people that establishment of what the country never had—sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone—is to be preferred over the preservation of what the country has had and will continue to have under the treaties—free and unimpeded access to the Panama waterway.

The protection of the national interests of the United States did not require us to demand sovereignty over the Canal Zone when the canal was built, and there is no reason to think that such sovereignty is now necessary.

Let me say clearly: The ratification of these treaties will achieve our basic objectives—first, to keep the canal open and available for use by the United States through this century and into the 21st century, and second, to maintain our defense rights through the 21st century to insure that our security will not be endangered. The treaties achieve these objectives through cooperation with Panama. They will result in increased trust and confidence between the United States and the Republic of Panama and between the United States and its other southern neighbors. Let us not fail to recognize that it is on such trust and confidence—the good neighbor policy—that a good part of America's strength in the Western Hemisphere depends.

Achieving our objectives by cooperation will also place the United States in a strengthened position to achieve our other objectives. After all, the national interests of the United States are many, they are plural, and the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties will allow us to tackle them with renewed strength and vigor.

Now, Mr. President, on tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m.—and I would hope that the debate would continue today until circa 6 o'clock p.m.—tomorrow at 10 a.m. the Senate will go into closed session for the purpose of examining materials and information allegedly relating to the government of Gen. Omar Torrijos.

These materials have been the subject of intensive and thorough investigation by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. The select committee has reported its findings, in some detail, to the Foreign Relations Committee, and tomorrow they will be discussed before the full Senate, behind closed doors.

According to the provisions of Senate Resolution 400, the Select Committee on Intelligence is charged with formulating and applying rules and procedures necessary to prevent the disclosure of information which infringes upon the privacy, or constitutional rights, of individuals. The resolution specifically prohibits any member of the committee, or any employee of the committee, or any Senator or employee who receives information from the committee, from disclosing such information.

The need for such strictures is obvious. We are dealing in the realm of national security interests, and of individual rights protected by the Constitution. Few would argue that protection of our national security interests require some intelligence activities that legitimately necessitate secrecy. Few would argue with the need—indeed, the constitutional mandate—to protect the privacy rights of individual citizens.

Balanced against this interest in preserving secrecy is the interest of the Congress, and of the public, to have the facts. Senate Resolution 400 provides a very carefully structured mechanism for balancing these sometimes competing interests.

Mr. President, there appears to be some public misunderstanding about the closed session on tomorrow. There appears to be an impression that the Intelligence Committee is withholding information from the Senate and the public, or that the executive branch is withholding such information. To the contrary: Senate Resolution 400 has provided the mechanism, which is being followed, for every Member of the Senate to have the facts; it will be for the full Senate to determine which facts can and should be disclosed without jeopardizing national interests and individual rights.

Among the provisions of Senate Resolution 400 is a requirement that the Select Committee on Intelligence report to the Senate on the nature and extent of intelligence activities, and on any such matters requiring the attention of the Senate. This provision of the resolution specifically incorporates section 8(c)(2), which is designed to protect the confidentiality of information in the possession of the select committee.

Subsection 8(c)(2) authorizes the select committee to make confidential information available to Members of the Senate, and to prescribe and apply regulations to protect the confidentiality of such information. It also specifically states:

No Member of the Senate who, and no committee which, receives any information under this subsection, shall disclose such information except in a closed session of the Senate.

It is important for the public to understand how the closed session came about, and what will happen there. As I noted previously, the Intelligence Committee is not only authorized, but it is also required to report to the Senate on intelligence matters. When, on Friday, February 10, the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole) exercised his prerogative to question the select committee about certain documents in its possession, the response—on my part, on the part of the minority leader, as ex officio members of the select committee, on the part of Senator Bayh, its chairman, and Senator Goldwater, its ranking Republican member—was to schedule a closed session at the earliest practicable date so that not only the Senator from Kansas, but all Members in the Senate, could have access to pertinent information and freely ask questions concerning such information. In the meanwhile, the staff of the select committee, and the materials in its possession have been available to Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, the purpose of the closed session is to provide Senators the opportunity to inform themselves about, and to debate, the information now in the hands of the select committee without jeopardizing our national security interests. The Senate will have before it on Tuesday a report prepared by the Intelligence Committee, including its recommendations as to what materials, if any, should be publicly disclosed.

The Senate then can determine whether the public interest would be served by disclosing all or part of those materials.

I feel confident that the Senate will pursue these matters within the spirit and the letter of Senate Resolution 400. That resolution is a landmark in the history of Congress. Until its adoption just 2 years ago, there was no legislative procedure adequate to the task of exercising congressional oversight over secret Government activities. The resolution provides an effective and efficient procedure for making legislative decisions concerning necessarily secret activities while respecting and preserving the Constitutional rights of people and serving the national security interests.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. GRIFFIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin).

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, while the distinguished majority leader is on the floor, I, like he, want to refer back to the some of the points and arguments that were made earlier; and with his indulgence, I wish to refer to a comment he made on February 10, during the course of the debate.

In his remarks, the distinguished majority leader called attention to references I had made to former Ambassador Linowitz, and my remarks in that respect were essentially a restatement of the concerns I expressed in my minority views. The distinguished majority leader at that time said this:

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) has referred to the expiration of the term of Ambassador Linowitz in a way that would imply that simply because the 6-month term of Mr. Linowitz as Ambassador was coming to an end, the treaties somehow had to be hurried, and the completion of the negotiations was hastily made. . . . The truth of the matter is that Mr. Linowitz did not have to have the title of Ambassador to continue to assist Mr. Bunker in the negotiations. . . . Let it not be said that Mr. Linowitz had to retain that title of Ambassador in order to continue to assist Ambassador Bunker in the negotiations.

Mr. President, at this point I shall read from the minority views that I filed on this particular point, as they appear beginning on page 198 of the committee report. Under the title "Other Concerns" is a subtitle, "4. Were these treaties negotiated in haste, under the pressure of a time deadline?"

Because the treaties contain so much ambiguous language and so many provisions of doubtful merit, it is appropriate to ask such a question. And, unfortunately, there is reason for some concern.

On February 10, 1977, shortly after he took office President Carter named Sol Linowitz to represent the United States as negotiator for the Panama Canal treaties. But, strangely, Mr. Linowitz was appointed only on a temporary basis—for a six month period. Under the law,⁹⁰ an appointment on this basis does not require confirmation by the Senate. Such an appointment operates to by-pass the usual scrutiny by a Senate committee of a nominee's qualifications and possible conflicts of interest.

If hearings had been held, the Senate would have learned that Mr. Linowitz served as director of a New York bank that had participated in making huge loans, still outstanding, to the Torrijos government of Panama.⁹¹ Furthermore, the committee might have cleared the air with respect to allegations that Mr. Linowitz formerly represented the Marxist Allende government of Chile, and was required in connection therewith to register as an agent of a foreign government.⁹²

Because the Senate is an integral part of the treaty-making process under the Constitution, it was unwise and something of an affront to the Senate for the Administration not to submit a treaty negotiator's name for confirmation. Utilizing such a short circuit procedure did not build Senate confidence in the treaty negotiations, and it also denied Mr. Linowitz the opportunity he should have had to explain away such possible conflicts of interest.

Mr. Linowitz, who was appointed on February 10, had six months—until August 10—to negotiate a new treaty without having his name submitted to the Senate for confirmation.

Interestingly enough, it was on August 10 that negotiators for the two countries finally announced their agreement in principle on new treaties relating to the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, that is the end of that portion of my minority views dealing with that particular subject.

Perhaps I am wrong, but as I read the majority leader's statement—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him in the middle of a sentence. If he would prefer, I will wait until he finishes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the Senator would wait, I would appreciate it; but I am always glad to yield to the distinguished majority leader, for whom I have such respect and admiration.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

I thank my friend.

Did not the Senator from Michigan have before the committee Mr. Linowitz, at which time he could have asked Mr. Linowitz questions concerning the purported conflicts of interest? If the answer is "Yes," my next question is, Did the Senator ask such a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I say to the distinguished majority leader that the first opportunity that this Senator had, or was aware of, was when Mr. Linowitz came before the Foreign Relations Committee after the treaties had been negotiated.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, but did the Senator ask the questions then?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It was a little late to get into his qualifications to be a negotiator at that time, because the treaties had already been negotiated. But I say to the Senator that at that time I do not think I was aware of the concerns I am now expressing.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator will agree, will he not, that Mr. Linowitz was before the committee on two occasions?

Mr. GRIFFIN. After the treaties were negotiated?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. On September 26 and October 19, in open session.

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is after the treaties were negotiated.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So the Senator had two cracks at Mr. Linowitz.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Obviously, the question before the committee at that time was not whether he was qualified or whether he should be confirmed. It was a de facto situation. We were presented with a treaty that had already been negotiated, and the question then was, What were we going to do?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Why raise the question now? He was before the committee; and if the treaties already had been negotiated, why not confront him with that?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will address myself to that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Then the record here would have been made clear.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is a legitimate question, and I will address myself to it.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, just to develop this point one step further? I think there is one other important factor.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the Senator from Maryland will permit me, I have something more to say, and it may be that in my statement I will answer the point of the Senator from Maryland. If not, I will yield to him.

Mr. SARBANES. I hope the Senator from Michigan will address himself to the April 20, 1977, meeting that was held with the negotiators, a closed meeting, to brief the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the progress with respect to the treaties; that meeting was well before the date to which the Senator has just referred.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That could be.

Mr. SARBANES. That, of course, provided an opportunity to the Senator to raise the very points to which the Senator is now addressing himself.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May I continue?

Mr. SARBANES. I hope the Senator, in the course of doing that, will address that meeting as well.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Perhaps I am wrong, but as I read the statement made on February 10 by the distinguished majority leader, it appears to me that he was suggesting that the President of the United States has a free hand in appointing individuals to participate in diplomatic functions. In fact, however, the President's power in this regard is limited by both the U.S. Constitution and statutory law.

Article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution gives the President the power to "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," to "appoint ambassadors and other public ministers."

At least since 1855, the term "ambassadors and other public ministers" has been interpreted to mean "all officers having diplomatic functions, whatever their title or designation."

I am here quoting an Attorney General's opinion of 1855 (7 Ops. Atty. Gen. 168).

It is true that on occasion during our history Presidents have appointed individuals to serve as ambassadors in a limited and special way for a President—particularly where some secrecy about the fact of the appointment was essential. However, in 1972 Congress formalized the arrangement by amending the Foreign Service Act of 1946 to preclude any such appointment for more than a 6-month period without Senate confirmation.

Let me read from the language of section 501(c) of the Foreign Service Act. It says:

On and after the date of enactment of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act of 1972, no person shall be designated as ambassador or minister, unless that person is appointed . . . in accordance with . . . clause 3, section 2, of Article II of the Constitution . . . except that the personal rank of ambassador or minister may be conferred by the President in connection with special missions for the President of an essentially limited and temporary nature of not to exceed six months.

The President does not have the power to assign individuals to perform diplomatic functions for a period exceeding 6 months without obtaining the advice and consent of the Senate. And appointments for less than 6 months which do not go before the Senate are by law supposed to be limited to assignments "of an essentially limited or temporary nature."

Given the tremendous importance of the Panama Canal Treaty negotiations and the fact that under previous administrations negotiations had continued without success for over a decade, in my view the President was at least ill-advised when he circumvented the Senate by appointing Mr. Linowitz on a temporary basis. After all, the Senate is under the Constitution an integral part of the treaty-making process—and surely the President must have known at that time that it would be difficult to get two-thirds of the Senate to ratify treaties that would, I will not say give away the Panama Canal, but which would seriously change the relationship.

Why the President did not—and I can only speculate as to why he did not—take the Senate into his confidence to the extent of submitting the name of the negotiator to the Senate for confirmation, I do not understand. But I think it is unfortunate that now we find out about some matters which I think Mr. Linowitz probably could have explained. He should have laid them before the committee. I have no doubt that he could have cleared the air, but I think it is very disturbing to find out these matters later. It is against this background that these treaties, it seems to me, have to be judged.

Perhaps it was just a coincidence that it was precisely 6 months to the day following the Linowitz appointment that “agreement in principle” was announced by the negotiators. But let me say that I am not the only one who has come to the conclusion that these treaties are poorly drafted and full of ambiguities—indicating that, perhaps in haste to meet a deadline, language was used which should not have been accepted. Let me just say the dean of the University of Panama School of Law, Prof. Camilo Perez, has described these treaties as “one of the most imperfect treaties in the entire history of international law.”

And Professor Perez further said that the United States must bear responsibility for any conflicts of interpretation, because the treaty was “signed in a hurry because the time given to Linowitz to complete negotiations was running out.” I am quoting here the dean of the school of law of the Republic of Panama.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, does the dean of that school of law oppose or support these treaties?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I really do not know.

Mr. SARBANES. It is my understanding he opposes them as being too accommodating to the interest of the United States. Is this correct?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That may very well be. I do not know.

I received in the mail last week a letter from Mr. Linowitz indicating that he understood I had several questions about his appointment as conegotiator for the Panama Canal treaties and would welcome the opportunity to discuss them with me.

I have written back to Mr. Linowitz. In my letter I do not indicate that I would not meet with him privately, but I make it very clear that I would rather read his response to the matters that have been raised. I would be delighted on his behalf to put his letter, or whatever his response is, in the Congressional Record, since it is in the Record that the concern about his appointment and his participation has been raised.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that copies of his letter and my response may be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follow:

WASHINGTON, D.C., February 14, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT P. GRIFFIN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRIFFIN: I understand that you have several questions about my appointment as Co-Negotiator for the Panama Canal Treaties, and I would welcome the opportunity to discuss them with you.

Please let me know when it might be convenient for me to drop by. I'll be looking forward to it and will await word from your office.

With appreciation,
Sincerely,

SOL M. LINOWITZ.

FEBRUARY 17, 1978.

Hon. SOL M. LINOWITZ,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LINOWITZ: Thanks for your recent letter.

Enclosed is a copy of my Minority Views filed as part of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's report on the Panama Canal treaties. You may be particularly interested in that portion beginning on page 198.

Of course, I would be pleased to have the opportunity to look over your comments concerning those or any of the other points that have been raised in connection with the treaties.

Sincerely,

ROBERT P. GRIFFIN, U.S. Senator.

Mr. GRIFFIN. To the point made by the distinguished Senator from Maryland, I can only repeat, as I said before, that—once treaties are negotiated and laid before us—I suppose that, of course, we can go back and try to conduct a fullscale investigation of the principal participant's background and what his qualifications and possible conflicts of interest may have been. This Senator certainly did not do that and did not feel that that would be the question before the committee at that time. We were then looking at the treaties. They were already negotiated.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield, the date I cited to him was an April 20 date. This was well ahead of the treaty date. Will the Senator yield on this point?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am yielding, yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Fine.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the Senator want the floor?

Mr. SARBANES. No, I just want to make a comment and address a question to the Senator.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Sure.

Mr. SARBANES. I think it is terribly unfortunate to bring in what I consider to be in personam arguments with respect to the merits of these treaties whose provisions are before us concerning the rights the United States has pursuant thereto. Now the Senator may choose to engage in a personal argument with respect to Mr. Linowitz. I think that is unfortunate for the following reasons. These points were raised early on at the beginning of last year, if the Senator will recall. Does the Senator contend that the matters which he is raising he only discovered recently?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Some of them, yes.

Mr. SARBANES. The matters that the Senator has cited were placed in the Record by other opponents of the treaty early in the beginning of 1977 and, therefore, were on the public record and were responded to by a letter from the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee who cited the clearance that had been given to Mr. Linowitz with respect to the conflict of interest question by legal counsel at the State Department. The Senator may then go on and say he disagrees with the legal opinion, but the fact—

Mr. GRIFFIN. No, the Senator has not said that.

Mr. SARBANES. But the fact remains the opinion was sought and an opinion was rendered. Therefore, I think it is unfortunate to engage in the sort of in personam attacks on Mr. Linowitz that have just taken place.

Furthermore, as I indicated earlier, when the Senator responded to the distinguished majority leader with respect to raising these issues in the hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and the response of the Senator from Michigan was that the hearings took place after the treaty and, therefore, he felt in a different posture with respect to raising the issue. But on the 20th of April, we had a closed hearing of the Foreign Relations Committee to get a briefing from the negotiators with respect to how matters were moving, and it is not my recollection that the Senator from Michigan raised the issue with Mr. Linowitz at that point.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May the Senator from Michigan have the floor again?

Mr. SARBANES. Surely.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator.

I think the Senator from Maryland is altogether missing the point that I am trying to make.

The point is not whether or not Mr. Linowitz was guilty of a conflict of interest. I am willing to concede that if he had had the opportunity in a confirmation hearing to explain his situation that he could have convinced us that there was no conflict of interest despite these items in his background. I wish he had had that opportunity.

What disturbs this Senator very much is that he was put in a position to negotiate a Panama Canal treaty in a 6 months' period, where he was operating under a very tight time deadline. As one lawyer and one Senator who has studied these treaties very carefully, when I find over and over again unfortunate and ambiguous language used, and when I find that at the last minute in the negotiation, in order to get a treaty, presumably, we gave away the right to even negotiate to build another canal in another country—then I think it is not altogether inappropriate to observe how this appointment was made, and the fact that he was operating under a 6 months' time limit.

Whatever the reason was for the President doing that, to me it was not a good idea—and, as I have already said, I think it was an affront to the Senate to circumvent the confirmation process by not submitting the name of the negotiator in such an important situation to the Senate for confirmation.

That is my point. I am not trying to attack Mr. Linowitz. I am not trying to say that he is guilty of any conflict of interest. I am only saying that it was unfortunate, if we want to build confidence in the treaties themselves, confidence within the Senate, and confidence around the country, that it was not handled in the regular appropriate way.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Of course.

Mr. SARBANES. First of all, I want to make one correction. The date of the meeting that I referred to was the 1st of April, not the 20th of April.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Well, I do not think that is relevant to the argument I am making.

Mr. SARBANES. No, but I want the record to be very clear if the Senator wishes to pursue the conflict-of-interest question.

The Senator is now separating two issues, and I think at least in that regard making some progress, because the question of conflict of interest was raised in the course of this debate by the Senator from Michigan.

If it is not relevant to the consideration, which I understand is the point the Senator is now making—he is dealing only with the question of a title in a 6-month period, contending there was undue haste at the end of that because the title would no longer apply, then it should not have been brought up. The introduction of the conflict-of-interest question was made by the Senator from Michigan. I regard that as extremely unfortunate, because it was unanswered much earlier, and if it was not answered to the Senator's satisfaction, he had the opportunity to pursue the matter ahead of the treaty being negotiated.

As to the second point, the 6 months' period, as the distinguished majority leader pointed out, Mr. Linowitz remained available to be part of the negotiating team with Ambassador Bunker. Therefore, the loss of the title was not important with respect to the treaty.

The third point I have underscored earlier. Since we have had these personal attacks with respect to the negotiator and with respect to some of the parties in Panama, I must stress that in the end we come back to an examination of the terms of the treaties. Are the terms of the treaties protective of American interests? That is what is at issue. So I would hope the Senator would not, in the course of trying to deal with the substance and the merits of the treaties, on which I recognize there are legitimate differences, in fact, undercut people personally, which it seems to me is not only irrelevant but unfortunate with respect to some able and competent individuals.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Well, I do not think it is irrelevant to call attention to the fact that there was a time frame of very short duration; namely, 6 months, in which this negotiator had to complete a treaty, and to note the fact that it was precisely on the expiration date of that 6-month period that the treaty agreement was reached.

I keep going back again to the fact that under the Constitution as it has been interpreted, all officers having diplomatic functions, whether they are to be titled Ambassador or whatever, are to be appointed and confirmed by the Senate, with the exception of the statute—and I am not sure even that is constitutional; that we can modify the Constitution and say that anyone having a diplomatic function can be appointed even for a 6-month period.

I would note, for example, that all Army officers, all Navy officers, and all Air Force officers are nominated and confirmed by the Senate. We may do it routinely, but it is required by the Constitution.

I just make the point again that I think, as we try to look at the merits of these treaties, which I have done in my minority views, which in the most part are dealing with the merits of the treaties, it is inescapable to also look at the background and the context in which these treaties were negotiated.

I am sorry that it is necessary to bring that up. I felt that the statement made by the distinguished majority leader had to be responded to. I welcome Mr. Linowitz' written explanation, and I will be glad, on his behalf, to put it in the Congressional Record, to make the record complete.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, in view of the statement which has just been made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record at this point excerpts from the Congressional Record of March 10, 1977, of an exchange of correspondence between Chairman Sparkman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the State Department dealing both with the legal authority for the 6-month appointment of Mr. Linowitz as Ambassador, and also dealing with the conflict-of-interest question which was raised earlier in the course of the debate by the Senator from Michigan.

I think it is important that this exchange of letters be placed in the Record at this point to indicate very clearly that the matters which are now being raised, as it were after the fact, were addressed at the very beginning of 1977; and I submit that the distinguished Senator from Michigan had more than ample opportunity to pursue the issues had he chosen to do so.

Mr. GRIFFIN. This was after the appointment had been made, and the authority of the Senate had already been circumvented; is that correct?

Mr. SARBANES. No; the Senator from Michigan had at that point, well ahead of the conclusion of any treaty, an opportunity if he wished to pursue these issues, either or both of them, or any additional ones that he felt the appointment raised.

It is my understanding—and if I am in error I would certainly like to be corrected—that the Senator from Michigan made no effort to do so prior to filing his minority report to the Foreign Relations Committee report—in other words, prior to the year 1978.

This is an exchange of correspondence inserted in the Congressional Record on March 10, 1977, almost a year ago, which addresses directly of the points which the Senator has been raising here on the floor today.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR SOL LINOWITZ

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues a couple of items of information bearing on the appointment of Ambassador Sol Linowitz to be a conegotiator in the Panama Canal talks.

In this regard, I wrote to Secretary of State Vance shortly after he discussed this appointment with me. Our exchange of correspondence on this issue makes it clear that Ambassador Linowitz's appointment will not extend beyond 6 months; and that this appointment is limited to the role of conegotiator and is not intended in any way to supplant Ambassador Bunker's role.

I ask unanimous consent that this correspondence be printed in the Record at the close of my remarks, along with that provision of the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended, which provides for short-term Presidential appointments with the personal rank of Ambassador.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In addition to the above, Mr. President, I want to bring to my colleagues' attention a letter dated March 7, which I received from the Department of State and which bears on certain conflict-of-interest allegations with respect to Ambassador Linowitz's current position. The conclusion of this letter reads as follows:

"As a result of the Department's review and the foregoing undertakings by Mr. Linowitz, the Acting Legal Adviser gave a written opinion which concluded that the requirements of the applicable statutes and Department of State regulations on conflicts of interest had been satisfied."

Mr. President, I believe this letter and enclosures will be of interest to my colleagues and I ask unanimous consent that it, too, be printed in the Record following the above-mentioned material.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JANUARY 31, 1977.

Hon. CYRUS R. VANCE,
Secretary of State,
Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing you with respect to our recent conversation concerning the appointment of Mr. Sol Linowitz.

It is my understanding that this appointment will be made for a period not to exceed six months and for the purpose of putting Mr. Linowitz in the position of U.S. co-negotiator on the Panama Canal talks. As I indicated to you, I have no objection to this arrangement for a not-to-exceed-six-month period, so long as the negotiations from the U.S. side are headed up jointly by Ambassador Bunker and Mr. Linowitz. I am sure you will agree with me that Ambassador Bunker has performed admirably throughout his tenure as chief negotiator and I am confident, as I am sure you are, that he will continue to perform in this fashion until these negotiations are brought to a successful conclusion.

I know that you will apprise me of any misunderstanding on my part about Mr. Linowitz's role. Similarly, I would appreciate being informed beforehand of any change in the co-negotiating procedure.

Sincerely,

JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, February 10, 1977.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letter of January 31 concerning the appointment of Mr. Sol Linowitz. That is to confirm that your understanding that Mr. Linowitz is to be appointed as Co-Negotiator with Ambassador Bunker on the Panama Canal Talks, with the personal rank of Ambassador for a period not to exceed six months, is entirely correct. There has been absolutely no change in the co-negotiating procedure.

Sincerely,

CYRUS VANCE.

EXCERPT FROM FOREIGN SERVICE ACT OF 1946, AS AMENDED

APPOINTMENTS

SEC. 501. (a) The President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint ambassadors and ministers, including career ambassadors and career ministers.

(b) The President may, in his discretion, assign any Foreign Service officer to serve as minister resident, charge d'affaires, commissioner, or diplomatic agent for such period as the public interest may require.

(c) On and after the date of enactment of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act of 1972, no person shall be designated as ambassador or minister, or be designated to serve in any position with the title of ambassador or minister, unless that person is appointed as an ambassador or minister in accordance with subsection (a) of this section or clause 3, section 2, of article II of the Constitution, relating to recess appointments, except that the personal rank of ambassador or minister may be conferred by the President in connection with special missions for the President of an essentially limited and temporary nature of not exceeding six months.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., March 7, 1977.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In light of certain statements by a member of the Senate and a member of the House with respect to Ambassador Sol M. Linowitz, I would like to make the following observations which may assist you and the members of your Committee in responding to questions or inquiries.

Ambassador Linowitz was appointed, last February 10, as Co-Negotiator for the Panama Canal Treaty, in the capacity of Special Government Employee with a six-month appointment to the personal rank of Ambassador, in accordance with applicable Federal and Department of State regulations and established procedures. He is serving in this capacity without compensation.

The Department of State conflict of interest regulations provide that no Department employee may "have a direct or indirect financial interest that conflicts substantially, or appears to conflict substantially, with his Government duties and responsibilities" (22 CFR 10.735-205). Pursuant to these regulations, Mr. Linowitz prior to his appointment submitted to the Department a full statement of his memberships on boards of directors as well as his financial holdings. These were reviewed thoroughly by the Office of the Legal Adviser.

In the cases of two companies, Pan American World Airways, Inc., and Marine Midland Banks, Inc., Mr. Linowitz furnished information from them outlining their activities and financial interests in Panama. Appended are the statements from the Presidents of these two companies. Based on the Department's review, Mr. Linowitz agreed that in the unlikely event any aviation issues arise during the course of the treaty negotiations which might be of possible interest to Pan American, he would recuse himself from participation in the negotiation of any such issues. Continued membership on the board of Marine Midland Bank did not violate the applicable regulations because of the relatively low level of financial transactions of the bank with and in Panama.

Mr. Linowitz also agreed that his law firm "is not now and will not while I am serving in this capacity, represent any client on any matter related to the Panama Canal Treaty negotiation or the Canal Zone."

In the case of Mr. Linowitz' financial interests, two companies in which he had small shareholdings—AT&T and Texaco—did have business which the Legal Adviser believed might be affected by the outcome of the Canal Treaty negotiations. Consequently, Mr. Linowitz agreed to sell his shares in those companies, and has done so.

As a result of the Department's review and the foregoing undertakings by Mr. Linowitz, the Acting Legal Adviser gave a written opinion which concluded that the requirements of the applicable statutes and Department of State regulations on conflicts of interest had been satisfied.

Sincerely yours,

KEMPTON B. JENKINS,
*Acting Assistant Secretary

PAN AMERICAN OPERATIONS, PANAMA

Prior to World War II, Pan American operated from both the Atlantic and Pacific side of the Canal Zone in Panama. When World War II started, the operation at France Field, located on the Atlantic side, was consolidated with the operation at Albrook Field on the Pacific side.

Pan American's operation continued at Albrook Field until the Republic of Panama developed an International Airport at Tocumen in October, 1949.

At one time, our operation in Panama was considerably more active than at present. Due to retrenchment in military forces, reduction in Panama Canal Zone international employees, long-range and wide-bodied aircraft, Pan Am has decreased its total activity through Panama.

The present 151 employees represent only 9.2% of our employees in Latin America or slightly over 1% of our employees worldwide in the field marketing group. Likewise, today the total sales of $10,000,000 for passengers and $4,000,000 for cargo represents .8% of our revenue.

MARINE MIDLAND BANKS, INC., OPERATIONS RELATED TO PANAMA

A. Past or Dormant Investments.—

1. Banco Inmobiliario de Panama S.A.—This is a small mortgage bank in Panama that engages in medium- to long-term housing mortgages and the warehousing of mortgage paper. We have just sold our 2½ percent interest.

2. Financiera Centroamericana S.A.—This is a general finance company engaged in commercial, industrial, and real estate lending in Central America, as well as holding an equity interest directly and indirectly in bonded warehouses in Central America and the Caribbean. This 22.4 percent investment was just disposed of.

3. Servicio de Anuario Telefonico Internacional S.A.—This company sold and distributed telephone books in several Latin American countries. We have preferred shares at modest value. This investment will be written off.

B. Current Investments.—

Marine, through Intermarine London, owns Bream Shipping, which was formed a few years back in conjunction with the international lending operations of Intermarine London. This company is presently not being used; however, it has limited assets resulting from prior activities conducted external to Panama.

C. Branch Operations.—

Most international banks have involvements in Panama consistent with that country's currency relationship with the dollar and its favorable climate as a financial center. Accordingly, the Marine started in Panama with a Regional Representative Office for Central America in 1971. It subsequently opened a branch operation in October 1973 to complement the Representative Office with a primary focus on generating corporate business in Panama and Central America, as well as deposit gathering from Latin America. As of November 30, 1976, it has total claims of approximately $32.4 million (of which $18.5 million is claims in Panama, and the remainder is almost entirely claims due from other Central American corporate clients). In Panama much of its business involves financing trade of corporations located in the Colon Free Trade Zone. The combined Representative Office and Branch have a staff of 25, 3 of whom are U.S. nationals. This operation is not large when compared to the activities of several others.

D. Loans.—

As a large international money center bank, the Marine conducts business throughout the world. Panama has long been a center for trade, as well as a notable financial center. Loans in Panama are a national consequence of the position of the bank and the country.

Marine Midland, either directly from New York or through the Bahamas or Panama Branch or foreign affiliate, has a $100,000 short-term unsecured loan available to the Hydroelectric Power Authority of Panama.

There is a $100,000 loan to the Agricultural Development Bank in Panama.

There is a $4 million loan to the Republic of Panama due in November, 1983. There is Marine's share in a $115 million international syndicated loan, managed by Citibank/New York. InterUnion/Paris, in which Marine directly owns 45 percent, also has a loan of $2 million to the Republic of Panama.

In addition to these direct loans to the Government of Panama or institutes of the Government, the Marine is engaged in normal short-term lending operations through the banks and the private sector in that country.

Intermarine owns two Panamanian special-purpose shipping companies, International Ship Finance (Panama) Inc., and Avon Shipping, Inc. These companies each own a Panamanian flag vessel on behalf of Japanese owners, which vessels are financed by Intermarine. These corporations are financing vehicles, and they are only notionally involved with Panama.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will be glad to read that. The point that disturbs this Senator, however, is that the President chose this irregular method of appointing a negotiator in such an important situation.

I, of course, had hoped that we would have treaties before us that I could consider were in the national interest, and that I could support. But I find so much that is wrong with them, so many ambiguities, so many things that in my humble opinion do not serve the interests of this country, that I must raise the point that they very well could have been negotiated in a hasty, last minute situation, and that disturbs me very much.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Charles J. Conneely of the staff of the Armed Services Committee be afforded the privileges of the floor during the consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, having listened to the colloquy between the two distinguished Senators, I am going to make my statement in its entirety, without yielding the floor, and then I will be glad to respond to any questions that any Senator might have.

I might say at the outset that I have been advised that our statements are no longer being carried on the radio since it is after the hour of 5 o'clock. Perhaps we can relax a little more at this time.

[Mr. Zorinsky assumed the chair.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, many thoughts have been expressed by various Senators since we started considering whether to advise and consent to the canal treaties. One suggestion was that we pay some attention to the views of the people of the country. My own mail is becoming heavier, although there is little, if any, change in the ratio of those for and against the treaties. Needless to say the overwhelming majority of the mail is in opposition to ratification. This in spite of every effort by the administration to educate the people to its point of view.

In fact, our chief negotiator, Ellsworth Bunker, stated in a talk in Los Angeles on December 2, 1975, that—

Our presence in the canal has a constituency among the American people—but our negotiations to solve our problem there do not. So, if we are to gain support, we must find it through candid and reasonable discussion.

These discussions, however, have not been productive insofar as changing the public view on giving the Canal Zone to Panama. While the State Department has been attempting to educate the American people to their point of view, we should remember that throughout our history the ultimate decisions in the United States have been made by the American people. Alexander Hamilton recognized this during the debates on the Constitution in 1788 when he said:

Here, sir, the people govern.

If our votes in the Senate are to reflect the views of the American people, these treaties will be defeated.

My opposition, in a broad sense, is that the treaties are written in a way to meet the demands of Panama and further the best interests of Panama rather than the best interests of the United States. At the present time the United States has possession and control of the canal. From the viewpoint of our own national interest there is no need to negotiate a new treaty. In my judgment, we do not obtain any benefits from these treaties but we lose substantially all of the interests we now have in the Canal Zone. It would appear that our negotiators have been willing to give Panama anything it wanted and that Panama has wanted everything it could get. This has resulted in a one-sided treaty. A treaty that, in my opinion, is not in the interest of the United States or in the interest of the free world.

Perhaps it would be well to initially consider what we have in the Canal Zone that will be lost by the ratification of these treaties. First, of course, is the canal itself, together with the installations, material, and equipment used in its operation. The canal is an important artery of commerce of great value from an economic and military point of view. Ownership will immediately be transferred to Panama, as more gradually will complete control. At the present we have roughly 3,300 American citizens residing in the Canal Zone who are civilian employees of the canal government and approximately 6,200 dependents of these employees. The American military forces consist of roughly 8,500 members with somewhat over 11,000 dependents, plus an additional 1,200 civilian employees assisting our military forces for a total of 30,186 Americans presently residing in the Canal Zone, according to testimony by General McAuliffe, the head of our southern military command. Of course, there are quarters, both military and civilian; 17 military bases; the Panama Railroad; the Thatcher Ferry Bridge crossing the canal on the Pacific side; highways of various kinds, including one crossing the entire isthmus; schools, hospitals, stores, and recreational facilities; the Military School of the Americas where officers from the various Latin American countries receive training and the jungle warfare school where our own troops are trained for jungle fighting. We have several pipelines of various sizes across the isthmus; pier complexes to handle cargo and storage, warehouses for material awaiting transshipment. It should also be recalled that all of the improvements within the Canal Zone were constructed by the United States, or purchased from the French company; that yellow fever and malaria were conquered, sanitary water and sewage systems established; that many American lives were lost in the establishment of this project which has been called the "moonshot" of its day. These facilities are said to have a replacement value of approximately $10 billion.

I believe the exact figure is $9.8 billion.

It is said that fewer than 1 percent of the original work force that built the canal were Panamanians.

I do not know, Mr. President, the nature of all of our military facilities within the Canal Zone but there have been newspaper accounts of foreign agents operating within the zone and it would appear that in closed session each Senator should be informed fully regarding additional military use, if any, being made of the Canal Zone. It would appear that this is the southern most base of operation for our military forces in the Western Hemisphere and military aid programs for all of South America are directed from our bases located within the zone.

In addition to the tangible assets that would be lost, the world community might well lose the right to cross the Isthmus of Panama to avoid the much longer route of going around the entire South American Continent to get from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean at prices shippers can afford to pay. The United States has always permitted transits of the canal at cost and, in fact, in recent years I understand that there has been a deficit in the operation of the canal even though tolls have been raised. But immediately after ratification, Panama will receive 30 cents per ton on all material passing through the canal, plus an annuity of $10 million per year, an additional annuity of another $10 million annually if toll revenues permit, and $10 million for providing fire, police, and sanitary services. There is no doubt that Panama will charge all that the traffic will bear when it is able to fix the rates. Last year I visited five South American countries, Colombia, Peru, Brazil, Argentina, and Chile. Even the leaders of these countries who support transfer of the canal to Panama wanted some provision against increases to tolls. Concern was also expressed about Communist influence and ultimate Communist control of the canal.

We cannot afford to ignore the Russian buildup of its military and naval forces; of its support for revolutionary movements throughout the world; Soviet pilots flying MIG aircraft in Cuba; or Russia supplying weapons and material for Cuba to intervene in the internal affairs of others nation; of Egypt, Ghana, and Somalia finding it necessary to expel the Russians; of Canada expelling more than a dozen Russian diplomats for attempting to bribe Canadian citizens to obtain intelligence information.

Russia using other nations to achieve its subversive goals in Africa is illustrated in a concise statement on page 29 of the February 20 issue of Time magazine entitled, "Moscow's Helping Hands." It points out that a number of Warsaw Pact nations, including East Germany, are aiding Cubans in Ethiopia, Angola, and other places. I ask unanimous consent that this statement be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows.

MOSCOW'S HELPING HANDS

"Doing the Kremlin's dirty work" is the way one Western intelligence official refers to them. Another labels them "Moscow's cat's-paws." These derisive descriptions refer to Communist countries that are busily reinforcing Soviet support for Ethiopia with sorely needed arms as well as military and political expertise.

Cuba has been the most prominent of Moscow's proxies, with 3,000 troops in Ethiopia, 19,000 in Angola and about 4,000 in nine other states. In recent years other Communist-ruled nations—most notably in Eastern Europe—have dispatched elite units to black Africa to serve Soviet foreign policy interests. Presumably, this strategy has been designed to help Moscow maintain a low profile and thus escape being branded a neoimperialist.

The efficient and ideologically rigorous East Germans have apparently been selected as the most trustworthy ally. First sent to Ethiopia last summer, East Germany's forces there now number an estimated 1,000. Senior East German officers assigned to the Ethiopian Defense Ministry helped to reorganize the country's armed forces, and no doubt have contributed to the planning of the current offensive. Other East Germans have been advising the Ethiopians on the military and ideological training of the police, militia, regular armed forces and youth groups. A hard-lining East Berlin Politburo member, Werner Lamberz headed a delegation that advised Addis Ababa about reconstructing the country's economy on orthodox Marxist lines.

The army and secret police of nearby South Yemen have been learning the latest security techniques from some 2,000 East Germans, assisted by about 4,000 Cubans, some of whom also seem to serve as a kind of Praetorian Guard for the country's repressive Premier Ali Nasser Mohamed. East Germany is also believed to be running three training camps in South Yemen for radical Palestinian commandos. East Berlin has dispatched "Brigades of Friendship," consisting of military, ideological, security and medical cadres, to Angola; in Mozambique, the East German "diplomatic" mission has become the largest in the country, exceeding even that of the Soviet Union. East Germany's increasingly complex African operations are now handled by a special secretariat in East Berlin, headed by Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Alex Schalk.

Hundreds of Czechs, Hungarians, Poles and Bulgarians are also aiding Ethiopia's forces. Technicians from Prague and Budapest have supervised the arrival of large quantities of weapons, such as AK-47 automatic rifles and machine guns, made by Warsaw Pact countries. Transporting arms and men from Eastern Europe to Ethiopia formerly presented only minor problems, since they were flown from their staging area in Libya over an unsuspecting Sudan. Until they were expelled in May, Russian advisers in Khartoum had tampered with the Sudanese radar network to create a blind spot in its coverage, in effect creating a "corridor" through which Soviet planes flew undetected.

Ominous though the Soviet presence in Ethiopia may be, Moscow may yet bungle this political opportunity as it has bungled others. Despite heavy political and military investments in Ghana, Egypt and Somalia, the Russians were ultimately tossed out of those countries. They and their cat's-paws may start to suffer if the war on the Horn begins to exact a toll. According to intelligence reports, Cuba's military presence abroad is now so unpopular that troopships must leave Havana at night.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, let me read just the first part of the statement.

All these happenings add credence to the warning of the former Chairman of our Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, in testimony on January 31 before our Senate Armed Services Committee. He said:

The defense and use of the Panama Canal is wrapped inextricably with the overall global strategy of the United States and the security of the free world. I submit that, if the United States opts to turn over full responsibility for the maintenance and operation of such an important waterway to a very small, resource poor and unstable country as Panama and then withdraws all U.S. presence, a vacuum will be created which will quickly be filled by proxy or directly by the Soviet Union as is their practice at every opportunity.

So, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, do not be surprised if this treaty is ratified in its present form, to see a Soviet and/or Cuban presence quickly established in Panama. In any event, any confrontation over the "neutrality" of the canal then becomes a confrontation with the Soviet Union rather than with Panamanian guerrillas or terrorists. With the Soviets already on the scene, as Senator Goldwater has pointed out, fighting our way in—with or without the help of the small 1,500 men Panamanian Army will not be without unnecessary loss of U.S. men and material, not to mention loss of the use of the canal.

I believe a permanent United States presence in the Panama Canal Zone to be the only feasible and safe posture for all of the nations of this hemisphere. In saying this I must also emphasize that the year 2000 is meaningless insofar as the requirements for the security of this hemisphere are concerned. The threat, the problems, the global balance will not change as if by magic in the year 2000, so why should we pass this dilemma down to our children and grandchildren.

Let us remember that Admiral Moorer, as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff was our No. 1 military man from 1970 to 1974. Although presently retired I believe his opinions are entitled to great weight. Therefore, I asked his views on the testimony of a presently active military commander, Admiral Weisner, the commander in chief of the Pacific, who previously had testified before the Subcommittee on Manpower and Personnel of the Armed Services Committee: The question posed was, if the canal was not under the control of the United States, could he see possible adverse effects on his command in the Pacific?

Admiral Weisner answered:

I can see an adverse effect, Senator Scott. It takes considerable time to move items by sea from the east coast to the Pacific. Without the Panama Canal you are adding 3 weeks time in shipping critical items as ammunition from East Coast ports rather than from West Coast port.

Then I asked him, aside from the time elements, would he see any need for an increase in the naval strength of this country if we did not have control of the canal. He answered:

Yes, we would have to put these critical items shipped by sea over a greater area to accomplish the same purpose.

Would we need a larger navy? and he said:

That is right.

When I asked Admiral Moorer whether he agreed with Admiral Weisner, he responded:

I agree with him on every point.

In fairness, I believe the treaty supporters agree that the Panama Canal is very important to our national security. Treaty supporters constantly argue that it is "use rather than ownership that is important" and that the United States can better assure use of the canal by ratifying the present treaties. Secretary of Defense Brown in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, stated:

Use of the canal is more important than ownership.

He later noted:

I think the canal is more likely to remain open to us with friendly Panama and a friendly Latin America than in a situation where the people of those nations look at the canal as an American ownership of the canal, and it works as an insult to them, as a threat to them.

There seems to be a strange logic that the United States would be in a better position if it reduced its present military installations in the Canal Zone from 17 to 4 after the treaties are ratified and entirely withdraw our military presence from the canal in the year 2000. The argument goes that, with a friendly Panama, the canal would likely be more available for the use of U.S. commercial and military ships.

What is ignored here is to whom we are giving the canal—today to General Torrijos and tomorrow to who knows what government in Panama, given that country's political instability.

Let us discuss for a moment who General Torrijos is. He is the dictator of Panama who took over that country from a lawfully elected government "at the point of a gun" in 1968. He is the same dictator who has increased the national debt of Panama from some $167 million to over $1.5 billion, the highest per capita national debt in the world. He is the dictator who has compiled a dismal record on human rights, according to Freedom House. He is the same dictator who has open admiration for Castro and who, on his return to Panama after the signing of the treaties in Washington last fall, sent the following message to Castro:

On my return trip to my country and flying above the sky of Cuba, I salute you with friendship always . . . in Latin America, our name is associated with feelings about dignity that have been channeled toward a shameful period of colonialism.

This is the same Fidel Castro who has 19,000 to 20,000 Cubans in Angola and several thousand Cubans in Ethiopia and, apparently, sees a need to have Soviet pilots fly air defense missions for him in Cuba. Torrijos is the same dictator who has never met the American Governor of the Canal Zone. This according to testimony of the Governor. I asked Governor Parfitt, when he testified before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Judiciary Committee, his personal opinion as to Communists within the structure of the Government of Panama.

Governor Parfitt, an active major general in our Army, responded:

I believe the general consensus is that the Panamanian Government itself is not Communist-leaning, but advisers in various places within the government are in fact Communists.

I asked, "This would be advisers to General Torrijos? Some of his advisers are believed to be Communists?"

Governor Parfitt answered, "That is correct."

Let me add that Governor Parfitt also testified at this hearing that our Government has not asked him whether the proposed treaty should be negotiated.

It seems untenable that the top U.S. official, the Governor of the Canal Zone, would not be asked his opinion before the treaties were signed.

But, Mr. President, it does not appear that we would be giving up our $10 billion canal to any great or reliable friend of the United States. This may in part account for the fact that Americans are bombarding the Senate with mail against ratification.

We are told that it really does not matter what General Torrijos is—a dictator—a friend of Castro's. The important thing is that the United States has the right to intervene after the year 2000 if the neutrality of the canal is violated. In addition, we also would be permitted "expeditious passage" of our ships during time of crisis.

As a practical matter, what does each of them mean? The right to intervene presumably means that the United States could move troops back into the Canal Zone if we felt that the neutrality of the canal was violated. What would be the effect of that if Panama violated the neutrality of the canal? Would we have the military run the canal after the year 2000? The same could be said of the "expeditious passage" of our ships. Does anyone really think that the United States would land military forces in Panama if our ships did not get what we thought was "expeditious passage" during a crisis? What is to stop the Panamanians from having a "slow-down" during a crisis in which they did not take our side—for example, with Cuba or any Communist nation.

As a practical matter, what is the advantage of intervention or "expeditious passage" when one compares it to current U.S. presence in and control over the Canal Zone? The entire Neutrality Treaty, even the proposed clarifying amendments, remind me of a "shell game." We are never going to know exactly what our rights are, whether after giving away title and control we will have the fortitude to return to the Canal Zone to enforce our rights, whatever they may be. If his treaty was a contract it might well be held to be void because of vagueness. Today we own the Canal Zone, we control it, our troops are there. I see no reason to change from a certain position of strength to an uncertain one of potential weakness.

U.S. MILITARY PRESENCE IN CANAL IMPORTANT

Admiral Holloway in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee stated that—

Because of the importance of the Canal, as a military man, I would very much like to have seen the complete responsibility and control of the operation and defense of the Canal in U.S. hands . . . We (the military) deplore the situation that leads us to have to resort to these treaties in order to ensure our continued use of the Canal.

Admiral Holloway also made clear his view that—

Without bases, the introduction of U.S. forces would take longer and be more costly.

Admiral Moorer stated:

I believe a permanent U.S. presence in the Panama Canal Zone to be the only feasible and safe posture for all of the nations of this hemisphere.

In response to a question on the importance of the United States having rights in Panama after the year 2000, Admiral Moorer responded:

I think it is mandatory that we maintain a presence through one kind of agreement or another.

INTERNAL THREAT TO CANAL

Some type of insurgency from inside of Panama is generally considered to be the most likely threat to the canal in the event the treaties are not ratified. Lieutenant General McAuliffe, the U.S. Southern commander, our top military man in the Canal Zone, stated in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee, that with forces under his control:

Under the most likely threats, we can limit such interruptions (to the Canal operation) to ones of short duration.

General McAuliffe also testified that sabotage of the canal was a difficult job.

In this regard, Admiral Moorer testified:

The most likely attacks can be handled with present forces. So far as the fear of another Vietnam is concerned, there is absolutely no comparison.

He added that—

The Canal itself is tough. One hand grenade, or stick of dynamite will not bring the Canal operations to a complete halt as some suggest. While I do not doubt that there could be student demonstrations motivated from time to time by—to quote Ambassador Bunker—“persons trained in communist countries for political action,” I do not think they comprise a threat that will bring about closing of the Canal or serious confrontation.

FORCES REQUIRED TO DEFEND THE CANAL

General McAuliffe testified before the Armed Services Committee:

If we are looking at simply a period of increased tension, then I would say my forces would need to have some modest augmentation security and surveillance forces in order to maintain our capability for defense over a sustained period. If on the other hand, we are faced with widespread violence . . . civil disturbances, guerrilla action and insurgency, then . . . my estimate (of reinforcement required) runs upward of about the sum total of 40,000 troops. . . .

Admiral Moorer testified:

The proponents of these treaties proclaim again and again that the only way to handle the internal threat is to ratify the treaties and give up the Canal. It is repeated over and over again that we are not interested in ownership, only continued use, which can be acquired only with the help of the Panamanians. Otherwise, they say, 100,000 troops will be required to defend the Canal and we will immediately be plunged into another Vietnam. I do not accept any of these scare statements. In the first place, a major part of the income of Panama is due directly to the existence of an operating Canal. If the Panamanians make an effort to sabotage the Canal, they are the ones that will be harmed. Most of them know this. In the second place, it is a gross overstatement to suggest that 100,000 men will be required to defend against saboteurs even if they are supported by the 1500 men Panamanian armed forces. I estimate that 50,000 or less would be adequate even in the face of an unusually large scale determined effort with outside support.

ATTITUDE OF LATIN AMERICA TOWARD TREATIES

Mr. President, one of the great myths surrounding these treaties is the view that the United States will alienate all of Latin America if we do not ratify these treaties. This point of view would have us believe that all of Latin America strongly supports U.S. turn-over of the canal to Panama.

Let us address this point. When former Deputy Secretary of Defense Clements testified before the Armed Services Committee, he indicated that Robert Hill, former Ambassador to several Central and Latin American countries, asked him to inform the committee that his contacts indicated most of these countries did not favor the treaties, because they were “convinced it would be an added cost to their economy” and because they were concerned “with respect to the security of the canal” since most of their trade depends upon efficient and economical operation of the canal.

At a meeting of the Organization of American States last year, the nations of Latin America passed a resolution by an overwhelming vote of 17 to 0 with three absentees to reaffirm:

The principle that the Panama Canal tolls should exclusively reflect the actual operating costs.

Panama abstained from this vote and apparently implicitly criticized the Organization of American States (OAS) for even considering the matter.

When Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board, testified before the Armed Services Committee he stated that the 19 countries of Latin America which comprise the Inter-American Defense Board:

Look at this Canal as the "Canal of the Americas" and it is important to those countries.

When asked concerning the views of Inter-American Defense Board countries on the treaties, General Sumner stated that he had talked to:

The Presidents, the Ministers of Defense and the high level military people of the 17 countries besides the United States and Panama, and that all express a very grave concern about the treaties.

He testified that—

They see the possibility here for conflict. They also see the possibility for mischief making by the Communists. * * *

He went on to add that all of these countries have "some type of Communist subversion or terrorism going on in their countries." General Sumner indicated that all members of IADB has "expressed reservations about the fact that the United States will no longer be in Panama. Once we do not have the bases there, then the entire area becomes destabilized."

Mr. President, from my own visits to Latin America made last year, I can confirm the views of both Ambassador Hill and General Sumner. There was considerable concern, particularly in countries on the west coast of South America concerning possible toll increases. Without question, the countries I visited in Latin America were worried about the possible involvement of Communists in Panama once the U.S. presence there was reduced or eliminated.

VIEWS OF RETIRED OFFICERS

Maj. Gen. J. Milnor Roberts, retired, executive director, Reserve Officers Association, testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and indicated that of 282 admirals and generals who responded to a letter from him on the canal treaties, 278 opposed. That would only leave four in support of the treaties. Let me cite some of the officers opposed: Gen. Lyman L. Lemnitzer, U.S. Army; Adm. John C. McCain, the former commander in chief, Pacific; Gen. Charles L. Bolte, former Vice Chief of Staff, Army; Maj. Gen. Ernest L. "Mike" Massad, former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense; Maj. Gen. Kenneth O. Sanborn, former commander, U.S. Air Force—South Panama; and Brig. Gen. John S. D. Eisenhower, U.S. Army Reserves, son of the late President Eisenhower. These are among the flag rank officers opposed to Panama Canal treaties signed by President Carter on September 7.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I decline to yield until I finish my statement. Then I will be glad to yield.

Several more names might be of interest to Senators:

Lt. Gen. Robert W. Colglazier, Jr., AUS, retired, former Deputy Chief of Staff—Logistics.

Lt. Gen. Stanley "Swede" Larsen, USA, retired, former Deputy Commander in Chief, Chief of Staff, U.S. Army—Pacific.

Vice Adm. J. F. Bolger, USN, retired, former Deputy Chief of Naval Personnel.

Maj. Gen. Glenn C. Ames, AUS, retired, nationally recognized leader, also, in the National Guard Association, Association of the U.S. Army, and former adjutant general of California.

Maj. Gen. Hombor I. "Pete" Lewis, USAFR, former Chief of Air Force Reserve.

There is even a Carter:

Maj. Gen. Leslie D. Carter, USA, retired, of Midlothian, Va.

As General Roberts testified:

Both Secretaries Rusk and Kissinger brought out the importance of grassroots knowledge. I suggest to you that right here we have more grassroots than you have seen for a long time, and the grassroots are overwhelmingly against the proposed treaty in Panama.

I know that much has been made of the support of the current members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for the proposed treaties. In this regard, let me cite the testimony of Admiral Holloway before the Armed Services Committee who stated:

Because of the importance of the Canal, as a military man, I would very much like to have seen the complete responsibility and control of the operation and defense of the Canal in U.S. hands.

He further stated:

We (the military) deplore the situation that leads us to have to resort to these treaties in order to ensure our continued use of the Canal.

Admiral Holloway made clear his view that—

Without bases, the introduction of U.S. forces would take longer and be more costly.

It would appear that from strictly a military point of view the JCS would have preferred to have military personnel and bases in Panama, but that when they considered the political situation there the JCS came down on the side of the treaties.

Mr. President, the Commander in Chief favors these treaties. He has said so many times on nationwide television and otherwise. Active military personnel have been taught the chain of command concept that they are subject to higher authority. It is ingrained in them. But once they have retired a greater freedom exists to exercise their own independent judgment. To me that explains why there is a difference of opinion—diametrically opposed positions between the active and retired military leaders.

It appears to me that giving up the canal will weaken our Nation and I cannot help think of Neville Chamberlain's efforts to obtain "peace in our time" shortly before World War II. In my judgment we should reject both treaties as being contrary to the national interest.

Mr. President, I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I wish to address the point that the Senator from Virginia just made with respect to the act of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The subject has been discussed before in the course of this debate, and I think it is an absolute disservice to the acting members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to imply that on this issue they are not reflecting their own true personal opinions.

We had the Joint Chiefs before our committee and directly put that question to them. General Brown was very forthright in indicating that he understood his responsibilities when he appeared before a congressional committee in response to direct questioning, that he gave his personal opinion, that that was what he was doing, that he had no difficulty with disagreeing with the Commander in Chief in those circumstances if, in fact, he disagreed. He then went on to voice his very strong support for these treaties.

Other retired members of the Joint Chiefs and service chiefs—Gen. Maxwell Taylor, General Ridgway, Admiral Zumwalt, General Westmoreland, General Norstadt—have endorsed these treaties. People may disagree with their judgment, but I hope that no one is going to question either the motives or the honesty or the integrity of either the Acting Joint Chiefs or former Joint Chiefs.

I disagree with the judgment or the wisdom of retired members whose names the Senator from Virginia has cited, who oppose the treaties, but I do not question their honesty or their forthrightness. I think it is a disservice to the Joint Chiefs to suggest that they are taking their position when it does not represent their true views.

Mr. SCOTT. I say to the distinguished Senator from Maryland that I have very high regard for the military. I have been privileged to serve on the Armed Services Committee since coming to the Senate. I have become personally acquainted with a large number of them, and I do not believe it is a question of their integrity. I think it is a question of indoctrination over the years. The Commander in Chief favors these treaties and his subordinates that are holding office. If we would put it on a more personal level, if in the Senator's own office, as a Member of the U.S. Senate, the Senator took a certain position—and we are talking about civilians now—I suspect that the members of the Senator's staff would take a similar position. When the Commander in Chief speaks, well, General Singlaub should listen. Perhaps he did not listen closely enough and he was called back and reprimanded.

Mr. President, let me read a letter that I received from a constituent that bears directly on this point. It is addressed to me, Senator William Lloyd Scott, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SCOTT: As a registered and active voter of Virginia I am writing to ask that you vote against ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties. I must also request that you not use my name in this matter as I have been told indirectly to support these treaties by General David C. Jones, Air Force Chief of Staff.

I am enclosing a copy of a message that General Jones sent to all commanders. Paragraph 5 makes it quite clear that we as military personnel are expected to support these treaties.

Although I cannot speak out publicly against the Panama Canal Treaties, I will not speak out in support of them either. * * * I would appreciate it if you and your staff not reveal how you received the enclosed message.

The unclassified telegram has a number of identifying features indicating the wide distribution it received. With these features removed, it reads to the following commands to which it was referred. And, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this telegram from General Jones with regard to the Panama Canal Treaties be printed at this point in the Record in response to the questions raised by my distinguished colleague from Maryland. I will be glad to let him have a copy if he cares to read it in its entirety.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

For Commanders from General Jones.

Subject: Panama Canal Treaties

1. On 10 Aug. 1977 Panamanian and U.S. negotiators announced agreement in principle on a conceptual framework for two new treaties. One, the neutrality treaty, provides for the permanent neutrality of the canal; the second, the Panama Canal Treaty, deals with the operation and defense of the canal. Both treaties would enter into effect after ratification and document exchange processes are complete. The neutrality treaty will be of indefinite duration, whereas the Panama Canal Treaty will terminate in all aspects on 31 December 1999.

2. The Panama Canal is a major defense asset, the use of which enhances United States capability for timely reinforcement of United States forces. Its strategic military advantage lies in the economy and flexibility it provides to accelerate the shift of military forces and logistic support by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and to overseas area. United States military interests in the Panama Canal are in its use, not its ownership. The proposed treaties would assure that access to and security of the Panama Canal are protected in time of war and peace.

3. As President Carter has stated, "We will have operating control and the right to protect and defend the Panama Canal with our own military forces until the end of this century. Under a separate neutrality treaty we will have the right to assure the maintenance of the permanent neutrality of the canal as we may deem necessary."

4. The Air Force actively participated in the development of all defense related aspects of the proposed treaties, and fully supports them. They would provide a basis for development of a continuing friendly relationship between the United States and Panama which would be of significant importance in insuring that the Panama Canal would be available to the United States when needed. Once the U.S. no longer operates the canal, the proposed neutrality treaty would provide an adequate basis for safeguarding our interests in the canal.

5. It is important that our personnel, particularly our senior people, understand our support for the proposed treaties.

Mr. SARBANES. May I say to the distinguished Senator from Virginia that the telegram is not responsive to the question I raised and the question, to put it again, is does the Senator from Virginia question or doubt that the endorsement of these treaties by the current Joint Chiefs of Staff represents their own personal view as to what was in the best interests of the United States?

Mr. SCOTT. No, I do not.

Let me read the Senator what I said.

Active military personnel have been taught the chain of command concept that they are subject to higher authority. It is engrained in them, but once they have retired a greater degree of freedom exists to exercise their own independent judgment.

To me that explains why there is a difference of opinion, diametrically opposed positions between the active and retired military leaders.

Mr. SARBANES. General Brown, if the Senator will yield further, stated in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, first of all, that—

The rules are quite clear that in response to interrogation before a congressional committee we answer fully and factually. The public record is quite clear where we have been in opposition to a Presidential decision.

And he then cited two examples and then went on to say, and I am now quoting General Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

So it is wrong to say that in the case of the Panama Canal we are doing this only because a decision has been made. I have personally worked very diligently for 4 years to achieve these treaties with Ambassador Bunker and subsequently with Ambassador Linowitz also and as we have testified the key point that finally found its expression in a treaty of neutrality was conceived within the Defense Department. We have worked hard for this treaty because we feel it is right.

And I am only asking the Senator from Virginia not to question—he may disagree with General Brown's judgment, he may quarrel with where he comes down on this issue—but I would hope he would not question General Brown's own personal integrity with respect to the position he has taken and enunciated so clearly on this issue.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me say that I have not questioned the integrity of General Brown. I have defended General Brown on two occasions when his name was brought before our Senate Armed Services Committee for statements that he had said that were subject to criticism by some. But I would ask the distinguished Senator how would he account for the vast difference in opinion between the retired military and the active military? I do not believe there is the slightest doubt numberwise, rankwise, that the retired military are opposed to this treaty. You can name a few names.

Mr. SARBANES. That is right.

Mr. SCOTT. But you cannot name a great many names. The percentage of the retired military are against this treaty.

Mr. SARBANES. In response to the Senator from Virginia, first of all I would say that there are a number of very distinguished retired military who support the treaty, some of the best military leaders we have had. Second, the current joint chiefs are the ones who have the responsibility for protecting our defense and strategic interests and they, therefore, are required to analyze the options very carefully and the choices that are before the country.

Let me just quote General Wilson, the Commandant of the Marine Corps, in testimony before the Senator's committee, not before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, before the Committee on Armed Services:

General Wilson said:

I can assure you that no one has put any pressure on me nor would I succumb if they did. I reach my position independently and I believe the other chiefs reach their own views independently.

These are the active people who have the responsibility and they have to make some tough judgments and they have to examine the matter very carefully.

Again the Senator may end up not agreeing with the judgment they make, but I do not think their good faith, their straightforwardness, and their honesty in reaching that judgment should be put into question. That is the point I am addressing. I think the distinguished Senator from Virginia ought to, as I think all of us have tried to do, accept the motivation and the honesty of the people on either side of this debate and not question their own personal view when they have clearly stated that this is what their opinion represents in response to direct questions before the congressional committees.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have twice responded to the distinguished Senator from Maryland. Active military personnel have been taught the chain-of-command concept that they are subject to higher authority. It is engrained in them. But once they have retired a greater freedom exists to exercise their own independent judgment.

To me this explains why there is a difference of opinion, diametrically opposed positions between the active and retired military leaders.

I cited a few minutes ago the response to the letter from Major General Roberts, retired, executive director of the Reserve Officers Association, where of 282 admirals and generals who responded to a letter from him on the canal treaties, 278 opposed, less than 2 percent for, less than 2 percent favored the treaty.

And I would ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland, because I have attempted to respond to him, why does he believe that there is such a difference between the retired military and the active military, because undoubtedly there is. I have put in the Record additional names, not wanting to take the time to read those names. I can read others if need be.

Mr. SARBANES. How many names did the distinguished Senator from Virginia cite in the course of this canvas?

Mr. SCOTT. Two-hundred eighty-two admirals and generals who responded to a letter from him on the canal treaties. Two-hundred seventy-eight were opposed. Now this is the executive director of the Reserve Officers Association. I think that is a respected group.

Mr. SARBANES. What was the nature of the letter which he sent?

Mr. SCOTT. I believe it is shown in the record of the Armed Services Committee, and I would be glad to read from the report of the committee.

Let me just start reading from page 587 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, the distinguished Senator's committee. He says:

Well, to take a look at that impression I wrote a personal letter to all of the flag-rank members of our association which are in excess of 700, and included many retired regulars, many regular officers as well as reserve and guard. This is what I said to them in part:

"You are certainly aware that the administration has mounted one of the most massive public relations campaigns ever directed from the White House in an effort to convince the American people that the treaty will be good for them. A significant part of the pro-treaty propaganda is designed to show that the military security of the United States would not be damaged. The present active duty Joint Chiefs have been persuaded to give their blessing to the treaty, and the chairman, General George Brown, has attempted to line up some flag-rank retirees on his side. However, Admiral Moorer, Admiral Burke, and other distinguished senior officers who are no longer subject to disciplinary action because they oppose administration policy, are on record in opposition to the treaty for very cogent reasons.

"It is my personal belief that the overwhelming majority of American military leaders are opposed to the 'pay-away' of the American Canal in Panama. Those of us who are not 'muzzled' should speak up so that our fellow citizens are not misled into the conviction that military leaders think the treaty is the greatest thing since we landed on the Moon."

As a result of that I have received replies and just this morning got a couple of more from 282 admirals and generals of the Armed Forces, from the regular component, the Reserve, the National Guard, Army and Navy and Air Force, Marines, and Coast Guard.

Of the 282, 278 opposed the treaty.

That is better than 98 percent of those responding opposed the treaty.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. SARBANES. The letter to which they were responding was a solicitation, in that they were asked to join in public opposition to the treaties.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, it would appear so.

Mr. SARBANES. Yes, indeed, it certainly would appear so. It was a direct appeal that they join with General Roberts in opposing the treaties.

Mr. SCOTT. The distinguished Senator is placing his own interpretation, because why would not the people who felt strongly the other way—they were afforded the opportunity, and only four of them said to the contrary. They were not afraid of being disciplined.

Mr. SARBANES. They obviously did not want to join. How many letters were sent out?

Mr. SCOTT. The record says approximately 700.

Mr. SARBANES. 700. So well less than half of those to whom the letter was sent responded.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I am told that when 10 percent respond, the Library of Congress has indicated to me that that is a good response, and I think this is an excellent response.

Mr. SARBANES. That is a good response to a communication from a Member of Congress. It may not be a good response when an association is communicating with its own members. But in any event—

Mr. SCOTT. It is certainly a valid sample, this response is.

Mr. SARBANES. As a factual matter, the response to a letter soliciting people to join in a matter—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Allen). Under the previous order, the treaty debate is to end at 6 o'clock. The time has run over 5 or 6 minutes, and the Chair is unable to indulge the Senators further.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesies of the Chair.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS SUBMITTED

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, press accounts have recently indicated that major issues of the Panama treaties were not resolved until the concluding weeks of the period of negotiations. It has also been asserted that these concessions were made as a result of pressure brought by Panama through a threat to reveal embarrassing actions taken covertly by the United States.

The Senator from Utah is not in a position to prove or disprove the allegations about Panamanian threats. However, it is possible to establish that significant concessions—this Senator would call them rash and dangerous concessions—were made at the last moment. There was certainly no need to rush this treaty, or to make such concessions. Yet the record now can show that such concessions were made in fact.

The Department of State has recently made available a July 11 draft of the Panama Canal Treaty. The draft made available is in Spanish and cannot be printed in the Congressional Record. However, a brief analysis of the July version has been made by staff, and shows conclusively that major decisions were made after that date.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the analysis and comparison of the July draft be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

According to a recently obtained preliminary draft of the Panama Canal Treaty, a number of significant concessions were made between July 10, the date on this document, and September 7, the date of signing of the final versions.

Several articles included in the official version do not exist in the preliminary draft. The latter contains no provisions for employment with the Panama Canal Commission (Article X, official document), or injunction against American Commission employees undertaking political activity in Panama (Article V). Similarly, the text does not address itself to the display of the Panamanian or American flag (Article VII). There is no mention either of the procedure to be used in the statement of possible disputes about the interpretation of the texts. (Article XIV).

A number of articles are substantially different. Whereas the official text (Article XII) calls for an American-Panamanian feasibility study of a possible sea-level canal, the preliminary draft flatly gives the U.S. the right to build it, with construction to begin fifteen years after the entry into force of the treaty. In the latter document, the clause giving Panama veto power over construction of a canal in a third country by the United States does not exist.

Differences exist with regard to the payments to be made to Panama. The annual $10 million payment in return for the public services Panama assumes in the former Canal Zone is given no mention. (This draft does not include details on the other payments, which were apparently still being negotiated at the time).

There are also variations with regard to the procedure to be followed in connection with certain lands (Article IX). The principal one relates to lands to which the licensing procedure is not applicable, or ceases to be applicable following the entry into force of the treaty. Under the July draft, individuals who own real property located on these lands may continue using the land at a cost no higher than that being paid before the enactment of the treaty. Under it, furthermore, Panama must allow the individuals to buy the land at a price which cannot exceed $500 an acre. In connection with the transfer of U.S. government property to Panama, (Article XII, official treaty) the Panama Railroad is not mentioned.

Under Article VIII of the official treaty, up to 20 officials of the Panama Canal Commission qualify for diplomatic immunity. Under the July draft, by contrast, a far higher number, 75, may receive it.

The provisions for the termination of the agreement are different in the two texts. While the final version calls for the treaty to expire on December 31, 1999, under the July draft it would end on that date or any time thereafter, with one year's prior notice required of the party wishing to terminate the agreement.

In the July draft, the section of the Annex detailing functions which may thereafter be performed by the Panama Canal Commission is not present. The section listing the functions which the Commission shall not perform exists in the preliminary draft, but two clauses are omitted from it. These are "commercial pier and dock service, such as the handling of cargo and passengers" and the blanket statement, "Any other commercial activity of similar nature, not related to the management operation or maintenance of the Canal." At present pier and dock service is one of the principal sources of revenue of the Panama Canal Company.

In comparing the finished English and Spanish version of the Panama Canal Agreement, a number of discrepancies come to light. The Spanish text "to handle" as the translation "to manage" in the context of American activities; similarly, it describes the Panama Canal Commission as having a "Board of Directors" which will "direct," while the English text refers to a "Board" which will "supervise." It is interesting to note that these problems are not present in the Spanish language July draft. Both "to manage" and "shall be supervised by a Board" are translated accurately.

DRUG TRAFFICKING IN PANAMA: AN APPRAISAL OF THE PROPOSED PARTNER OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, tomorrow, under a unanimous-consent agreement, the Senate will go into a closed session to discuss the allegations that have been brought against Panama with regard to trafficking in drugs. Such a procedure has both advantages and disadvantages. While it will allow Senators to examine and debate material now sealed in the files of the Select Committee on Intelligence, it will also prevent the American people from forming their own conclusions of the evidence. We have seen in the fruits of the Warren Commission the distrust and uncertainty which such a procedure breeds when it is applied to deeply felt, emotional issues. There must be no hint of coverup, no suggestion that secrecy has been imposed to silence politically damaging revelations.

If these treaties are ratified, the American people will be entering a 22-year partnership that confers great benefits upon a foreign government—benefits that could have been kept for the American people. The American people will be justifiably angered if it turns out that the Panamanian Government is controlled by an international gangster.

A major problem involved in the discussion of such matters in a closed session is that it imposes serious constraints upon any Senator who participates. A Senator must bend over backwards to avoid discussing privileged matters; he has to err on the side of too much caution. Sometimes the procedure has the effect of putting a gag upon knowledge already in the possession of a Senator before he is given access to classified matters. Since the Senator from North Carolina has not yet had access to the files of the Intelligence Committee, he would like to discuss today the publicly known issues and facts before the record is closed. What I hope to do today is to lay down some basic principles as a public framework for the closed debate tomorrow.

BASIC PRINCIPLES

Here are the considerations we ought to keep in mind:

First. The issue is not an internal matter of Panama. The Panamanian drug traffic has very much involved the health and welfare of the United States.

Second. The Panamanian drug traffic is not a matter which is to be viewed as a problem in which many nations are involved in the general context of international relations; we have always had a special relationship with the Republic of Panama.

Third. Panamanian drug traffic has itself been stamped with a special character; the role of Panama has been unique and far reaching.

Fourth. The overwhelming evidence on the public record of the Panamanian drug traffic in the early seventies is not to be dismissed as past history; the participants today occupy positions of trust in the present regime in Panama.

Fifth. The absence of aggressive investigative or diplomatic action by the United States since the signing of the Kissinger-Tack agreement of February 1974 is not to be taken as evidence that Panama has been "cleared"; rather, the obvious self-interests of both governments suggest either a coverup or a temporary cessation of activity during negotiations and Senate debate.

Sixth. Although it is important to sift all evidence relating to the complicity of Omar Torrijos himself, Torrijos himself is not the issue. The focus should be on Panama as such; its form of government; its record of enforcement and cooperation over the past 10 years; and the complicity of a broad range of Panamanian officials and their relatives and friends.

Seventh. The evidence we are looking for with regard to the Panamanian dope traffic does not have to be limited to the type of evidence that would convict in a U.S. court. We are debating the conferring of a great benefit in Panama, at great expense to ourselves, and we are not trying to convict in a court of law.

Eighth. Finally, it is not correct to treat the Panamanian drug problem as a side issue to the treaties; for the treaties would place the United States in an intimate and mutual partnership with Panama that would be unparalleled in our relationship with any other nation in the world. Moreover, the provisions of the treaty and its related agreements place our Nation in the position where the United States is specifically prohibited from enforcing drug traffic controls in a U.S. Government facility that has great potential for criminal abuse.

THE EVIDENCE

The evidence now available shows that Omar Torrijos has aided, abetted and protected the drug traffic in Panama. In brief form, the evidence for the complicity of high Panamanian officials in the narcotics traffic is this:

First. Panama's geographic location and its transportation facilities make it an ideal location for the transfer and control of narcotics shipments either by sea or by air.

Second. In a 1973 report based on testimony and on-the-spot investigation by the House Merchant Marine Committee, Panama was found to be the conduit for one-twelfth of the heroin coming into the United States—enough for the daily supply of 20,000 addicts.

Third. Cases involving drug trafficking reached the highest levels of the Panamanian Government. Omar Torrijos and his Foreign Minister Juan Tack led public efforts to discredit and cover up revelations of such drug trafficking incidents.

Fourth. Moises Torrijos, brother of Omar, was indicted by a grand jury of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York as a coconspirator in a New York case in which five Panamanians were convicted and imprisoned for narcotics trafficking. The indictment still stands, and Moises Torrijos is liable for arrest if he steps on U.S. soil.

Fifth. According to the sworn statement of Leland L. Riggs, Jr., former Customs attaché at the U.S. Embassy in Panama, a warrant had been issued to arrest Moises Torrijos on the basis of the indictment, and that he, Riggs, was ordered to arrest Moises upon his scheduled arrival in the Canal Zone from Spain by passenger ship. However, Moises was forewarned, disembarked in Venezuela, and arrived by air, landing in Panama. Mr. Riggs points out that only the U.S. State Department and the CIA had advance knowledge of the planned arrest, and "Moises Torrijos could only have been alerted to the planned arrest by U.S. authorities."

Sixth. John Ingersoll, then Director of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, traveled to Panama, met with Col. Manuel Noriega, Chief of Panamanian Intelligence, and with Gen. Omar Torrijos, and discussed the indictment and warrant.

Seventh. Moises Torrijos had earlier been Panamanian Ambassador to Argentina, and had been declared persona non grata for his activities in that country. Even though he was persona non grata in Argentina, even though he was indicted in the United States, even though his government had been informed of the indictment, he was named Ambassador to Spain. He now enjoys high favor and currently is also director of treaty information for Panama. Despite this new responsibility, Moises Torrijos has never come to the United States since his indictment, not even for the treaty signing ceremony on September 7, 1977.

Eighth. The arrest of Raphael Richard Gonzales at the John F. Kennedy Airport on July 8, 1971, with 151 pounds of heroin, led to a series of arrests and convictions of Panamanians and to the indictment of Moises Torrijos. Richard was the son of the Panamanian Ambassador to the Republic of China (Taiwan) and was attempting to use a diplomatic passport to bring in the heroin without customs inspection. Under international law, Richard was not entitled to a diplomatic passport; yet he bore such a passport signed by the Panamanian Foreign Minister, Juan Tack. Richard had made successfully four previous such deliveries of heroin undetected.

Ninth. The arrest and conviction of Joaquin Him Gonzales, air traffic controller of Panama's Tocumen International Airport, pointed up the crucial role which Tocumen has played in international smuggling. Him directed planes carrying millions of dollars worth of heroin to special areas of the airfield, where the cargoes were guarded by uniformed members of the Panamanian Guardia Nacional. Him was arrested in U.S. territory in the Canal Zone, and convicted in Texas, where he had arranged heroin deliveries. He was also an associate of Moises Torrijos.

Tenth. The Yolanda Sarmiento case points up the role of the Colon Free Zone in international smuggling. Intended to be a duty-free location for the import, display, and sale for export of manufactured goods, the Free Zone is not under the control of Panamanian Customs, but of the Guardia Nacional. According to Leland Riggs, Jr., the U.S. Customs attaché in Panama, Yolanda Sarmiento was responsible for shipping 100 pounds of heroin monthly to the United States. This heroin was stored in the Colon Free Zone. The Free Zone is 50 miles across the isthmus from Tocumen Airport; reportedly the heroin was shipped from the airport to the Free Zone in Guardia trucks. The United States recently agreed to the expansion of the Free Zone by leasing Old France Field, which is in U.S. territory, to Panama for $1 a year.

Eleventh. Another Torrijos brother, Hugo, is in charge of the Panamanian state gambling casinos and the national lottery, operations which generate large amounts of unaccounted-for cash. He also owns a large nightclub which is a center for prostitution and retail drug dealing. The arrest of Gerado Sanclemente for narcotics in June 1977 created consternation. Sanclemente is married to a cousin of the Torrijos brothers; he was induced to come to Panama from Colombia and to set up various business enterprises under their protection. He lived in a building owned by Hugo, which was also the offices of the National Casinos. His apartment in this building was the center of drug dealing. According to depositions taken in Panama, Hugo intervened to urge Sanclemente to give himself up. Subsequently, Sanclemente was taken to a medical clinic near a private airport used by the Guardia and Government planes; he escaped from the clinic and was taken away by a waiting plane.

Twelfth. A third Torrijos brother, Marden, is traveling ambassador extraordinaire for the Government of Panama. Although no further information is available as to his duties and activities, the documented use of diplomatic passports for narcotics trafficking casts a cloud over the legitimacy of his appointment.

Thirteenth. Several investigative sources report that Omar Torrijos is a business partner with Frank Marshall Jimenez in several businesses relating to transportation, including trucking firms, bus-lines, and nonscheduled airlines. Also included in their interests is a freight forwarding firm that controls shipments into and out of the Colon Free Zone. Marshall is a fugitive from Costa Rica, a former member of the Costa Rican legislature, who used his legislative immunity to cover extensive liquor smuggling operations. When his immunity was lifted by Costa Rican authorities and arrest threatened, Marshall fled to Panama.

IMPLICATIONS

The facts related above have profound implications for the consideration of the Senate during the debate on the Panama Canal treaties. The first considerations go to the integrity of the Panamanian Government; the second go to the effect on the treaties of the treaties themselves.

It is sometimes said that the integrity of the Panamanian Government or the character of its leaders are irrelevant to the treaty debate; it is said that the treaties represent the universal aspirations of the Panamanian people no matter what government might be in charge. Nevertheless, the only way that we can deal with the Panamanian people is through their government. It is self-evident that the treaties are agreements made with the government, not with the people. Therefore, even if it be granted for the sake of argument that the treaties do represent the aspirations of the people, if the government is deeply flawed it cannot be the vehicle for the fulfillment of those aspirations.

Although corruption exists in almost every government, including our own, the key to integrity is whether there also exist the checks and balances which can identify that corruption and eliminate it. No one can pretend that the Panamanian Government is a representative government, or that it contains checks and balances. Even outside the governmental system, there are no political parties, no free press, or other countervailing political forces. In form it is a military dictatorship; in practice it is a fiefdom for the Torrijos family and their favored cronies.

Although the Panamanian Government has made a great show of narcotics enforcement, in practice most of those arrested are small dealers, or third country nationals who are attempting to muscle in on the territory. The market for the Panamanian dope trade is not Panama, but the United States. Only those with the right connections can prosper; those who are arrested know that they are subject to extortion if they want their freedom.

This posture is evident in the restrictions which were placed upon U.S. agents working out of the U.S. Embassy in Panama. They received cooperation from Panama only so long as their cases dealt with "little people." Before they could proceed to investigate a case, permission had to be obtained from Panamanian officials; the moment the case involved any member of the National Guard or substantial amounts of drugs, permission was denied. On the side of the U.S. Government, State Department officials worked hand in glove to reinforce these restrictions on U.S. narcotics agents. The actions taken to thwart the impartial justice of the U.S. judicial system in the case of Moises Torrijos is a sensational example; but the daily effect of similar actions in operational activities is bound to have a chilling effect on the effectiveness and output of U.S. narcotics agents.

The impact of the narcotics trade upon the United States hardly needs to be discussed. It takes a toll not only in the thousands of addicts whose lives are ruined, but in the climate of crime and fear in our cities, the toll of robberies, injuries and deaths suffered by thousands of innocent citizens, the increased costs of welfare and medical attention, and the social costs of the decay of our great cities. The fact that Panama's leaders would participate in or condone such injuries to the United States should make us pause before we confer substantial benefits upon them.

IMPACT OF THE TREATIES

The ratification of the treaties would have the following impact:

First. The treaties would make us an intimate partner with a corrupt regime which uses the machinery of government for criminal gain. The benefits which will be conferred upon Panama will be placed into the trust of this corrupt regime. The daily knowledge of the citizens of Panama that the United States is supporting this regime in power and pouring millions of dollars into corrupt hands will inflame hostility and hatred against us. The over-riding object of the treaties purportedly is to improve relations with the Panamanian people; but it is far more likely that our relations will become worse.

Second. Panama would take total jurisdiction over customs. The treaties and related agreements specifically provide that offenses in narcotics trafficking will be under Panamanian jurisdiction, even in the canal operating areas. At the present time, U.S. Customs officials are able to search ships, make arrests (as, for example, in the case of Joachim Him, and in the attempt on Moises Torrijos) and to pass on information to Customs officials waiting at ports in the United States. None of this will be possible under the treaties.

Third. Panama will take charge of the Ports of Balboa and Colon, including piers, warehouses, and security. Thus it will be possible for a corrupt government to control completely the shipments of narcotics by sea, just as the Panamanian Government now controls Tocumen Airport.

Fourth. The Panama Canal Company presently has an Internal Security Division, which includes a narcotics intelligence unit. When the treaty is implemented, the canal organization no longer will collect narcotics intelligence. The canal operation, which has thousands of Panamanian workers, many of them in daily contact with foreign ships, will be a U.S. Government agency under the treaty; yet the United States will not be able to enforce or even collect information on the violation of U.S. narcotics laws on U.S. Government property.

Fifth. The unique geographic location of Panama at the midpoint between the two continents makes it ideally suited as a center for drug smuggling by airplane. The United States will be hampered in its drug enforcement programs because we will no longer have agents free to operate in the Canal Zone; U.S. enforcement personnel attached to the U.S. Embassy will continue to be under restrictions from officials who put good relations with Panama above the broader interests of the American people.

Mr. President, in order to provide a basis for the debate on the drug problem tomorrow, I ask unanimous consent that the following documents be printed at the conclusion of my remarks:

First. The statement of Leland Riggs, Jr., for the use of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers;

Second. A series of articles by UPI reporters Nicholas Daniloff and Cheryl Arvidson on the drug situation in Panama;

Third. Excerpts from the book, "The Secret War Against Dope," by Andrew Tully, dealing with the Raphael Richard case;

Fourth. Excerpts from a 1973 report of the House Merchant Marine Committee dealing with narcotics trafficking in Panama.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

STATEMENT OF LELAND L. RIGGS, JR.

Leland L. Riggs, Jr., being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

I, Leland L. Riggs, Jr., am a retired Special Agent in Charge of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration. I am familiar with facts involving narcotics intelligence collection in Central America.

I first became a criminal investigator for the U.S. Bureau of Customs in January, 1964, after having spent 8½ years as a highway patrolman. I was first assigned by the Bureau of Customs to duties in California where I conducted narcotics smuggling investigations for a period of 6½ years. Therefore, I was promoted from Customs Special Agent to Senior Customs Representative and was transferred to Mexico City, Mexico. Inasmuch as I am bilingual and speak Spanish, my assignment to Mexico was deemed to be advantageous to the agency.

While assigned to Mexico City, I had sole responsibility for Customs narcotics intelligence gathering and for conducting followup investigations forwarded to me by our domestic offices of investigation. My area of responsibility included not only the Republic of Mexico but additionally all of Latin America. However, 95 percent of my investigative time concerned either Mexico or the Republic of Panama.

During the time I was in Mexico in 1970 and 1971, I conducted several investigations in Panama. Subsequently, in June of 1972, I was appointed Customs Attache and instructed to establish an office in the American Embassy in Panama City, Panama. This occurred during the period when the entire Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs agents force had been expelled persona non grata from Panama. I served as Customs Attache until July 1, 1973, at which time the Drug Enforcement Administration was formed and I then also assumed command of the Panamanian functions of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs when the Bureau of Customs narcotics functions were merged with those of the BNDD. In short, I became the Special Agent in Charge of the combined office.

I left Panama on June 17, 1974, to become the Special Agent in Charge of the DEA District Office in Brownsville, Texas. Thereafter while on temporary assignment as Project Manager for a special DEA operation in Colombia directed against clandestine cocaine processing laboratories in Colombia, on November 30, 1975, I was attacked, beaten, and pushed off a retaining wall to a street below and suffered several fractured vertebrae, a broken ankle, kidney damage, and assorted cuts and bruises. The DEA subsequently retired me on August 24, 1976, for medical disability reasons.

When I first began conducting investigations in Panama, the BNDD Agent in Charge advised me that we had to be very careful about informing Panamanian government officials concerning our work since they were corrupt and also involved in narcotics trafficking. I soon learned from personal experience that this advice was sound.

During September, 1970, I traveled to Panama to conduct a follow-up investigation regarding a Yolanda Sarmiento case involving shipments of heroin from Panama to New York. Although I do not have presently in my possession intelligence reports prepared by me at that time, I do recall certain aspects of the case. Yolanda Sarmiento reportedly was smuggling approximately 100 pounds of heroin monthly into the United States. This heroin was reported to be stored in the Colon Free Zone in the Republic of Panama.

The Colon Free Zone is a large, fenced-in, heavily guarded section of Colon, Panama, on the Atlantic side where duty-free items are displayed in numerous stores for purchase, by persons and businesses based primarily in South America. I was advised by U.S. Canal Zone officials and a confidential source that the Guardia Nacional controlled and guarded this enclosed area. I later did manage to gain entrance with a U.S. Canal Zone official; however, we were only permitted to go into the showcase areas of the various stores. The Colon Free Zone is entered at a gate guarded by uniformed members of the Guardia Nacional. Although the Government of Panama does have a Customs Office and there are Panamanian Customs Agents, Panamanian Customs does not have responsibility for control of the Free Zone.

During 1970, United States Customs Agents in New York were able to effect the arrest of Yolanda Sarmiento, Emilio Diaz Gonzales, and others; however, Yolanda Sarmiento was released on bail, subsequently fled the country, and became a fugitive in Argentina. As best I recall, Emilio Diaz Gonzales escaped from prison in New York and is believed also to have fled the country.

My efforts to continue a follow-up investigation of the Sarmiento case were essentially unsuccessful because of the problem inherent in free movement within the Colon Free Zone resulting from the control of the Free Zone by the Guardia Nacional of the Government of Panama.

During my trips to Panama, I became aware of a BNDD investigation concerning the Panamanian chief air controller, Juaoquin Him Gonzales. Juaoquin Him was reportedly directing heroin from Panama into Texas and using his official capacity in the Government of Panama to facilitate the movement of this heroin. He was subsequently indicted by a U.S. Grand Jury in Texas and was arrested when he entered the U.S. Canal Zone to attend a softball game. Joaquin Him was tried and convicted for facilitating the transportation of narcotics into the United States.

I understand that the arrest of Juaoquin Him caused considerable dissension between the Ambassador and the U.S. narcotics agents in Panama. I experienced similar problems in connection with the Raphael Richard-Moises Torrijos case.

I learned of the Richard-Torrijos case after my assignment as the Customs Attache to the American Embassy in Panama. In fact, I became directly involved in the investigation concerning Moises Torrijos, now Panamanian Ambassador to Spain, and Raphael Richard Gonzales, the son of the then-Panamanian Ambassador to Taiwan. Richard was arrested on the evening of July 8, 1971, at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York in possession of 151 pounds of heroin. Immediately prior to his arrest, he claimed diplomatic immunity and asserted that his suitcase could not be opened and searched due to his diplomatic passport. A U.S. customs inspector advised him that he was accredited as a diplomat in Taiwan, not in the United States, and therefore had no diplomatic status in the United States. Also arrested that evening was Nicolas Polanco, a reported chauffeur-bodyguard of Moises Torrijos. Moises Torrijos was then the Panamanian Ambassador to Argentina; and he is the brother of Dictator Omar Torrijos.

The day following the Richard arrest, Guillermo Alfonso Gonzales was also arrested upon his arrival in New York City from Panama for the purposes of accepting delivery of the heroin Richard had attempted to bring into the country. Others arrested the same day were Jose Francisco Oscar San Martino, an Argentine, and Cesar and Amarico Altanirano, both Panamanians.

Subsequent investigations of the same case led to the indictment of Moises Torrijos by a Grand Jury of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York. Torrijos was indicted as a co-conspirator with the above-mentioned defendants. Thereafter, a warrant for the arrest of Moises Torrijos was issued by the U.S. Court for the Eastern District of New York. One the basis of the evidence of a warrant, I was instructed to be on the alert to effect an arrest in the event Moises Torrijos traveled from Spain through the U.S.-controlled Panama Canal Zone.

During either late 1972 or early 1973, I was advised that Moises Torrijos, accompanied by his wife, was traveling from Spain to Panama on a passenger vessel.

Subsequent information showed that the vessel would dock in Cristobal, Panama, within the U.S.-controlled Panama Canal Zone. Arrangements were therefore made to effect the arrest of Moises Torrijos in the U.S. territory upon his arrival. However, Moises Torrijos was obviously informed of his impending arrest and departed the vessel at Caracas, Venezuela, where he flew by commercial airliner to Tocumen Airport within the Republic of Panama. When the vessel arrived, only Mrs. Moises Torrijos disembarked. Inasmuch as the only parties aware of the planned arrest of Moises Torrijos other than BNDD were the U.S. Department of State and the Central Intelligence Agency, Moises Torrijos could only have been alerted to the planned arrest by United States authorities.

During my tenure as Special Agent in Charge of Drug Enforcement, I did not have another opportunity to effect the arrest of Moises Torrijos. In fact, during my tour of duty as Customs Attache before assuming command of the combined Customs and BNDD forces, I was advised that Washington officials of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs traveled to Panama, met with Colonel Noriega, Chief of Panamanian Intelligence, and with General Omar Torrijos, and alerted them both to the existence of an indictment and warrant concerning the General's brother, Moises. To the best of my knowledge, the warrant for the arrest of Moises Torrijos is still in existence and presumably, if he touches U.S. soil, he is still liable to arrest.

During my tour of duty in Panama, several cases which were presented to the Panamanian enforcement officials were mysteriously terminated or not given proper attention. Due to my knowledge of their involvement, many cases were not presented to Panamanian enforcement officials so as not to compromise my investigation. Finally, I did not feel that I had the full support of the diplomatic community in the pursuit of my assigned mission in Panama, especially in those matters which tended to implicate officials of the Government of Panama. In any event, due to the eventual assignment of a State Department employee as the narcotics coordinator, I was relegated to a secondary position. Similar conditions now exist in most embassies where Drug Enforcement personnel are assigned, and in almost all cases the Department of State employee has no narcotics training nor expertise. It is my opinion that Department of State personnel are placed in the position of narcotics coordinator primarily to insulate and protect the activities of the Department of State from any so-called disrupting incident regarding narcotics enforcement directed against an official of the host government.

Given under my hand and seal on this the first day of December, 1977, in the City of Washington, District of Columbia.

UPI INVESTIGATION OF DRUG TRAFFICKING IN PANAMA—PART I

(By Nicholas Daniloff and Cheryl Arvidson)

WASHINGTON.—Since 1971, the U.S. government has received a stream of allegations linking Panama's Supreme Revolutionary Leader, Gen. Omar Torrijos, his family and associates to drug trafficking, a UPI investigator has disclosed.

The allegations—some from officials, others admittedly second-hand—come from informants, drug pushers and agents. They are in files of the Canal Zone government, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the U.S. Army, the CIA, and congressional committees.

Attorney General Griffin Bell wrote Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., last October that a grand jury had reviewed allegations against Torrijos and found insufficient evidence to warrant action.

The Justice Department says Torrijos has been "neither the subject nor target of an investigation." Federal drug enforcement chief Peter Bensinger states the disclaimer more cautiously: "General Omar Torrijos has never been the target of investigation."

President Carter is aware of the allegations. Carter, Bell and Bensinger met last fall to discuss their implications in the uphill battle to win Senate ratification of the treaties that would turn the Panama Canal over to Panama.

The allegations prompted the Senate to schedule a rare closed session Feb. 21 to examine them.

Treaty supporters call the drug questions peripheral to the canal issue.

But Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., says they involve the integrity of the Panamanian government and its ability to stand behind the agreements.

The current Senate ratification battle is so close opponents feel the drug issue could defeat the treaties. Supporters, short of the needed two-thirds majority, have accepted changes in the treaties, but hope to avoid the volatile drug issue.

United Press International began its investigation in January. Two UPI reporters examined scores of documents, many supplied by treaty opponents. These included investigative reports, affidavits, congressional testimony and interviews with officials in Panama and Washington.

Among at least 45 files on "the Panama connection" compiled by DEA, there are dossiers on Omar Torrijos, his brother Hugo, head of Panama's casinos; his brother Moises, Panama's ambassador to Spain; Col. Manuel Antonio Noriega, chief of Panama's intelligence service; and other officials and associates.

During the investigation, UPI confirmed that Moises Torrijos was indicted in the Eastern District of New York for heroin trafficking in 1972. A bench warrant for his arrest was issued May 16, 1972.

An attempt to arrest Moises Torrijos in December 1972 in the Canal Zone failed, according to several sources, because the Torrijos brothers were tipped by high U.S. officials. So far as is known, Moises is still subject to arrest on U.S. territory.

UPI also learned of a series of unusual actions to safeguard DEA files on the Panamanian situation. The files were moved several times during one week in October and rumors circulated on Capitol Hill that some documents may have been removed.

U.S. concern about narcotics smuggling through Panama goes back to the Vietnam War period. U.S. narcotics agents estimate up to 47 tons of narcotics arrive in this country from Panama each year.

This volume has led U.S. officials to suspect that the "Panama connection" operates either with the aid or negligence of Panamanian officials.

"There's no doubt that senior officials in that country are involved," one former official told UPI. The source, who asked not to be named, had direct responsibility for stopping the narcotics flow from Panama.

Panama, linking the oceans and North and South America, is a natural transit point for contraband. Whenever goods are consigned to bonded warehouses for trans-shipment, smugglers have opportunity to hide drugs in legitimate cargoes.

For at least the last 17 years, drug agents have watched goods and passengers transiting the canal, the U.S. Canal Zone, Panama's free trade zone at Colon and Panama City's Tocumen International Airport.

One airport official, Jose Delgado, was named by two Panamanian informants as a connect for cocaine packages from Colombia destined for Omar Torrijos.

Former Panamanian intelligence agent Alexis Watson told House investigators Jan. 5 about an incident he witnessed at the airport in November 1976:

"There is a Colombia guy * * * he says he is Torrijos' second cousin. He used to come to Panama each week. When he came * * * this is something that I investigated and I saw the package * * * he carries some packages. He was received by Torrijos himself. They went to a place in the free zone of the airport * * * a guy named Delgado, and left the package there."

Watson told House Merchant Marine Committee investigators he did not see the contents, but was convinced they were drugs. He said a Panamanian Air Force pilot told him he was flying to El Salvador to deliver just "one package that Delgado has from Torrijos."

A second Panamanian informant also named Delgado and others in sworn testimony: "Their actions and involvement with Torrijos and other Panamanian officials make it highly probable that they are either actively involved or at least very knowledgeable of narcotics being smuggled into and out of Panama."

Watson told House investigators the Transit S.A. company, which he said was operated by Omar Torrijos and Noriega, handles Colombian coffee with cocaine inside.

Watson said in November 1975 he saw associates of Torrijos take "three sacks of two kilos of cocaine" out of coffee bags. He said Carlos Duque, manager of Transit S.A., and Orejita Ruiz, a former Torrijos bodyguard, and a Lt. Col. Cecilio Fisher of the National Guard were involved. The second Panamanian witness also said Duque and Fisher were in the drug traffic.

In 1972, Watson also said he saw Omar Torrijos, Panamanian President Demetrio Lakas and a suspected drug dealer named "Padilla" in Lakas' office dividing about $200,000 in $100 bills. "I think if Padilla is there, it was drugs," Watson said.

Noriega, who last week called Watson "a paranoid and an embezzler," was praised recently by Bensinger for anti-narcotics efforts. But in DEA intelligence reports, Noriega is mentioned along with other drug traffickers.

Watson also testified Noriega ordered him in 1971 to release Padilla's brother and an American he had arrested in Panama City.

"I called my commander and told him I had two people with cocaine, five or six pounds. I gave their names, I had their identification in my hand. Immediately I received the order, 'Put those people on liberty.'"

The House interviewers asked: "Who was your commander?"

WATSON. "Noriega."

INVESTIGATOR. "You called Noriega on the radio?"

WATSON. "He didn't speak to me, but the order received by radio said: 'Number One says to free those people'."

INVESTIGATOR. "'Number One' meant Noriega?"

WATSON. "Yes."

The congressional testimony meshes with the picture emerging from the following DEA documents:

A 1973 document states that Colombian suspect Andres Velasquez planned a trip to Tocumen Airport to make a drug drop for the Torrijos brothers.

A 1974 report quotes an informant as saying Frank Marshall Jimenez "worked directly with and for Gen. Omar Torrijos in Panama and that between the two of them, they control the contraband traffic from the free zone of Colon, Panama."

It also states the Torrijos brothers "own 33 1/3 percent interest in the Gran Hotel de Costa Rica and that the gambling casino there was operated by the Torrijos interests . . . This hotel has been suspected of being a contact point for international narcotics couriers."

A 1975 document states Ramiro Rivas, owner of a Panamanian cement company, tried to buy a freight company to help move drugs for Omar and Hugo Torrijos.

In an interview, a high U.S. diplomat in Panama criticized Omar Torrijos for retaining Hugo as director of national casinos: "It's just too much of a temptation."

Hugo Torrijos' name surfaced when Panama seized 145 pounds of cocaine at Tocumen Airport on June 9, 1977.

One suspect was Gerardo Sanclemente, a Colombian married to a Torrijos relative, Gloria Nubia Quinceno. Sanclemente allegedly helped move narcotics through the airport. He carried a "courtesy of the port" card, which assured him favored treatment and a letter from Hugo Torrijos to Delgado.

Senora Sanclemente quoted Hugo as telling her in a phone call, "I want Gerardo to give himself up, it's the only way I can help him. I want him to call Dario Arosemena (chief of Panama's equivalent of the FBI) at 22-2415, and turn himself in; he won't be mistreated or anything."

Sanclemente complied. Because he was ailing, he was confined to a hospital near Panama City's Paitilla airport."

In October of last year, a second suspect held in Paitilla medical center bribed a guard and escaped to Colombia. Rumor's swept Panama City that Sanclemente had escaped, too. U.S. authorities in Washington and Panama City denied the rumors.

Questions about Hugo Torrijos' activities still circulate.

"Hugo Torrijos has a background from 20 years before as a cocaine addict," Watson told investigators. "Everybody in Panama knows. If you ask someone in Panama, 'Where can I buy cocaine.' They will tell you, 'go to Hugo.'"

Watson recalls, too, seeing Omar and Hugo publicly snorting cocaine in a bar run by Hugo in 1961: "We started drinking when about 12 midnight, I saw him and Hugo take drugs. And I asked (a companion) what is Omar doing?"

He said: "They are big, so you don't have do anything about it."

Watson is convinced Omar Torrijos no longer handles drugs personally.

Omar can't be so stupid to handle this thing in that way, Watson told UPI in a telephone interview Feb. 10 before leaving the United States for a hiding place abroad. Watson fears his disclosures will provoke Torrijos to reprisals.

Next, the supreme leader's brother—an indictment and a tipoff.

PART II

WASHINGTON.—One of the best documented instances of Panamanian government involvement in narcotics led to the indictment of Omar Torrijos' brother Moises, now Panama's ambassador to Spain, for heroin trafficking.

A two-month UPI investigation of the case turned up allegations that the Panamanian "Supreme Revolutionary Leader" was tipped off to the indictment against his brother by high U.S. officials and that Moises was able to evade arrest.

On July 3, 1971, Rafael Gonzalez, the 23-year-old son of the Panamanian ambassador to Taiwan, was arrested at New York's Kennedy Airport with 154 pounds of heroin in his suitcase.

Richard was carrying a diplomatic passport signed by Juan Tack, then foreign minister, who represented Panama in canal treaty negotiations during the Nixon-Ford years.

Richard claimed diplomatic immunity, but customs agents determined he did not have legitimate diplomatic status.

Also arrested was Nicholas Polanco, chauffeur for Richard's uncle, Guillermo Gonzalez, a former bodyguard of Moises Torrijos, was believed to be a ringleader in heroin smuggling.

Customs agents discovered the trip was Richard's fifth trip with similar amounts of heroin, according to police reports. On previous trips, Guillermo Gonzalez had accompanied Richard, but this time, Richard and Polanco were to telephone Gonzalez in Panama on delivery of the heroin.

The agents persuaded Richard to call his uncle and urge him to come to New York. When Gonzalez arrived, he was arrested. Three others, an Argentine and two Panamanians, also were arrested. Gonzalez was convicted of heroin smuggling and sentenced to seven years in prison.

When the news reached Panama, according to one Panamanian who was present, Col. Manuel Noriega, Panama's intelligence chief, told an associate. "You heard this ass-hole kid stuck his foot in it?"

Another Panamanian informant told House Merchant Marine subcommittee investigators that the associate replied, "Yes, yes, we're going to fix it."

Subsequent investigations resulted in the indictment of Moises Torrijos as a co-conspirator in the transportation of heroin. The indictment was handed down by a grand jury in Eastern District of New York, in May 1972 and a bench warrant for the arrest of Moises was issued on May 16, 1972, U.S. sources said. As far as is known, the indictment and warrant remain in force, meaning Torrijos is subject to arrest on U.S. territory.

A former high government official familiar with the case told UPI the evidence against Moises went far beyond helping obtain a diplomatic passport for Richard: "I've been told fairly recently that we have one hell of a good case against Moises Torrijos."

At the time of the Richard arrest, Moises was Panama's ambassador to Argentina. Later in 1971, he was recalled at Argentina's request after causing offense at a diplomatic reception. He was then assigned as Panama's ambassador to Spain.

The indictment has never been unsealed although the Miami Herald last October quoted Justice Department sources as confirming its existence.

UPI learned that U.S. narcotics agents tried to arrest Moises Torrijos in December 1972 but failed because other U.S. officials apparently had tipped Omar Torrijos to the indictment.

UPI was told by three sources that John Ingersoll, former head of the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs—DEA's predecessor—went to Panama and passed the information to the Panamanian leader.

Retired DEA agent Leland Riggs, who tried to apprehend Moises Torrijos, gave a sworn affidavit to a Senate Judiciary subcommittee stating he was assigned to the case on his arrival in Panama in June 1972: "I was instructed to be on the alert to effect an arrest in the event Moises Torrijos traveled from Spain through the U.S. controlled Panama Canal Zone."

Riggs said in December 1972, "I was advised that Moises Torrijos, accompanied by his wife, was traveling from Spain to Panama on a passenger vessel. Subsequent information showed that the vessel would dock in Christobal, Panama, within the U.S. controlled Panama Canal Zone."

Riggs said arrangements were made to arrest Torrijos in Cristobal when the ship arrived.

"However, Moises Torrijos was obviously informed of his impending arrest and departed the vessel at Caracas, Venezuela, where he flew by commercial airliner to Tocumen Airport within the Republic of Panama. When the vessel arrived, only Mrs. Torrijos disembarked.

"Inasmuch as the only parties aware of the planned arrest of Moises Torrijos other than BNDD were the U.S. Department of State and the Central Intelligence Agency, Moises Torrijos could only have been alerted to the planned arrest by United States authorities," the Riggs affidavit said.

UPI determined that on June 21, 1972, six months before the arrest attempt, BNDD chief Ingersoll went to Panama to discuss the indictment with Omar Torrijos.

The following is a second-hand account which Senate investigators say they obtained from a "principal" at the meeting:

Omar Torrijos was sitting in a hammock with his feet propped up and smoking a cigar when Ingersoll and his group arrived.

Ingersoll told Torrijos he was reluctant to discuss the situation but "in fairness" he thought the general should know that his brother, Moises, had been indicted in New York for heroin smuggling and a warrant had been issued for his arrest.

"The guy at the meeting said Torrijos made no move at all. He continued to smoke his cigar and there was no change in his facial expression. He didn't even take his feet down," the Senate source said.

Ingersoll offered to send someone to Panama to discuss the indictment with Moises, but the general said that wouldn't be necessary. But some time later, Torrijos contacted U.S. officials to send someone to meet with his brother.

Riggs, when questioned informally by Senate investigators, said he didn't know about the Ingersoll trip. But Riggs said his diary noted a Jan. 30, 1973, visit to Panama by Jerry Strickler, who Riggs identified as head of a Latin American division of BNDD in Washington.

After discussions with American officials, Strickler and agent Ed Heath met with Moises Torrijos, a session Riggs said he had assumed was the "first official notification" of the indictment.

UPI reached Ingersoll in Paris where he now works for IBM. He was asked about his trip to Panama in June 1972.

"I don't know what you're talking about," Ingersoll replied. "You expect me to remember what I was doing in June of 1972?"

Ingersoll said he had traveled to Panama "several times" to meet with Omar Torrijos but told the reporter to ask "the DEA people," * * *

"I'm not denying or confirming it, and I suggest to you that if you want a denial or a confirmation that you refer your quote allegation unquote to the Department of Justice," Ingersoll said.

UPI learned from three sources—all in narcotics enforcement at the time—that a "government decision" led to Ingersoll's meeting with Torrijos where information on Moises' indictment was relayed.

Two sources said they believed the decision was made to put "pressure" on the Torrijos government.

One said the purpose was to reinstate agents who had been expelled from Panama in March 1972, after press leaks about the Richard investigation implicated Moises and Tack. The other source said Ingersoll might have offered to "go light" on Moises if Panama would strengthen anti-narcotics efforts.

The third source said the trip was made to avoid "an international incident." He said three White House meetings were held to discuss the tipoff. At these meetings, the source said, were Ingersoll, Egil Krogh, chairman of Nixon's cabinet level narcotics committee, Vernon Acree, former U.S. customs commissioner, and State Department representatives.

Ingersoll, the source said, got the assignment because of his "acquaintanceship" with Torrijos "and could approach him on a discussion basis."

"After the indictment was returned, there was a lot of concern and consternation over that fact because it did involve the brother of Torrijos. . . . The concern was if he came to the United States, he would be arrested. I think some of the State Department people were concerned over the fact that this might cause or create some kind of international incident," this source said.

PART III

WASHINGTON.—A UPI inquiry into drug trafficking allegations against Panamanian strongman Omar Torrijos poses questions about what happens when U.S. foreign policy objectives and narcotics law enforcement collide.

Several sources interviewed by UPI during a two-month investigation left a clear impression U.S. officials sometimes give "preferential treatment" when drug investigations—often based on hearsay—lead to officials of foreign governments, including but not limited to Panama.

The policy goes back at least to the early 1970s. It exists, sources indicated, because diplomatic and political considerations frequently take preference over narcotics enforcement efforts. In these cases, it is not deemed in the best U.S. interest to vigorously pursue the leads.

It also was suggested that despite known Panamanian government involvement in drug dealing, U.S. narcotics agents still need a working relationship with the country's police to stop other drug smuggling to the United States.

"Some (cooperation) is better than none," one current drug official commented.

A former enforcement official told UPI, "We have to do business there. If they're corrupt, we have to find out how they're being corrupted."

"I have no doubt that what the U.S. government really knows about these allegations will eventually become known," one American diplomat in Panama said.

"But in the meantime," he said, "the United States is in a real dilemma. Our intelligence files contain potentially libelous information on many world leaders. Are we to make these known to the public? Or should we withhold them because they may be libelous and because their release might affect foreign policy interests?"

The Carter administration inherited this policy, but the practices followed in the past became highly meaningful when Carter's negotiations reached agreement on treaty proposals to phase out U.S. control of the canal.

Alleged drug involvement by Torrijos, his brothers and his government may be peripheral to the question of ratifying the treaties, as their supporters claim, but it also could bolster opponents attacks on the integrity of the Torrijos regime! In fact, conservative opponents concede the drug allegations may now be their only hope to stop the treaties.

Faced with intense conservative opposition and an uphill ratification battle last fall, the Carter administration apparently decided last fall to take extraordinary efforts to keep the drug questions out of the public eye.

Included were administration pressures to quash a congressional inquiry that could have brought some allegations to light, secret movement and possible removal of DEA documents relating to the drug charges, and a decision to limit congressional access to the materials by giving them to the Senate intelligence committee.

In late September, Sen. James Allen, D-Ala., a leading treaty opponent, held the first hearings on the treaties before his Judiciary subcommittee.

Allen's subcommittee knew nothing of the drug allegations. Instead, it was focusing on reports involving U.S. bugging of Omar Torrijos.

The subcommittee wanted to find out whether Torrijos used knowledge of the bugging to blackmail American negotiators into making concessions. This suggestion was later denied by the Senate intelligence committee.

Allen's subcommittee issued two sets of subpoenas to an Army sergeant who supposedly sold the information to Torrijos and top officials of intelligence agencies and the Justice Department.

The first subpoenas dealt specifically with the bugging incident. A second set—far more broad—was issued later. Quentin Cronnelin, staff director of the Allen subcommittee, believes the broad scope of the second subpoenas caused alarm because they might have opened up the drug issue.

Attorney General Griffin Bell, in a Sept. 29 letter to James Eastland, D-Miss., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the subpoenas were "overboard" and said they "could result in a serious misunderstanding" between the Intelligence and Judiciary committees.

The administration enlisted help from Senate Democratic Leader Robert Byrd, like Eastland a member of Allen's subcommittee, and from the top members of the intelligence committee—Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, and Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz.—to stop the Allen hearings.

After what one individual described as "the most intense pressure I've ever seen" on Allen, including threats of Senate censure, the Alabama Senator backed off. The hearing was canceled and the subpoenas became moot.

About this time, two vocal treaty opponents, Sens. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., and Bob Dole, R-Kan., were getting hints of raw intelligence data in government files relating to the Torrijos regime and narcotics.

The Allen subcommittee hearings were cancelled on Sept. 30—a Friday.

Documents and rumors circulating on Capitol Hill suggest that on the following Monday, there was a White House meeting between Bell, President Carter and others.

The Justice Department confirms that Bell met with Carter that day, but the White House claims to have no meeting recorded. However, the White House press office said that Carter might have met with Bell without a record of the session being made.

Congressional sources told UPI that at the Oct. 3 session and at another meeting later that week—reportedly Thursday, Oct. 6—there was considerable discussion about the drug material and its ramifications on the treaty debate if it became public.

A suggestion reportedly was made to Carter that he classify all government documents on the subjects as "national security" material.

The President rejected this suggestion, sources said, and accepted a second option—limited disclosure to “safe” congressional sources, including the Senate intelligence committee, Byrd and Senate Republican Leader Howard Baker.

UPI ascertained that Bell and DEA chief Peter Bensinger did, in fact, brief Baker, Byrd, Inouye and Goldwater Oct. 6 on the drug allegations.

According to congressional sources, at this meeting Byrd told Bell and Bensinger that the best way to keep the lid on the drug allegations would be to send the files to the intelligence committee where strict security could assure “no leaks.”

Later in the day, sources said the same briefing was given House Speaker Thomas O'Neill, who reportedly told Bensinger that “under no circumstances” should the files be sent to any House committee because of possible leaks.

A large number of drug files were moved from DEA to the Senate intelligence committee in late October or early November. Senators must sign a pledge not to reveal what they read in committee files under threat of action by the Senate Ethics Committee.

An intelligence committee report based on these documents was presented in secret session to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and a “sanitized version” is due to be released soon.

A closed session of the Senate will also be based on the material in the hands of the intelligence committee.

Although administration officials have repeatedly stated that all the government's files relating to Panama drug ties were sent to the intelligence committee, UPI was told that some material may have been removed before it reached Capitol Hill.

There have been suggestions that some sensitive material may have been placed in Bell's office safe or may have been destroyed.

In addition, UPI received reports that the DEA files relating to Panama were moved at least four times during one week in October—all but once without the usual accounting and receipting procedures to protect them—before they reached the intelligence committee.

Dole made the first public mention of files being moved from the DEA headquarters to its Washington field office during Senate debate on Oct. 13. The movement of files also came up with State Department officials during a hearing by Allen's subcommittee Nov. 15.

But when UPI attempted to get more information, reporters had to gather details indirectly, apparently due to a Bensinger warning on Oct. 7 that any DEA employee who leaked material on Panama would be fired and face criminal charges.

Congressional sources gave UPI details said to come from a DEA employee afraid to provide information directly to reporters. The information passed through two people before being relayed to UPI.

UPI was told that on Oct. 7, the Panama files were moved under high security from their normal storage site in DEA to the 10th floor of the building. One of the offices on the 10th floor is that of Gordon Fink, assistant DEA administrator for intelligence.

The following was the procedure as described to UPI:

With armed guards posted, the files were spread across table tops and examined, and particularly sensitive material removed. Bill Link, an assistant to Bensinger, was identified as supervisor of the operation.

Once the files reached the 10th floor, Link reportedly ordered the normal procedure known as a “paper trace”—requiring people in possession of files to sign receipts for them—suspended.

The files were sifted until 9 p.m. Between 11 p.m. and midnight, Bensinger went to the White House to brief Carter. Carter reportedly voiced concern over the impact of the information on the treaties if it became public.

The White House said it had no record of a late night visit by Bensinger on Oct. 7 but because of the lateness of the hour, conceded it might not have been recorded.

On Saturday, Oct. 8, an individual provided details on the file movement to a congressional source. At that time, he expressed concern about the security of the files.

On Sunday, Oct. 9, the files were moved to the field office. They were returned to headquarters Thursday, Oct. 13, to an individual identified as “Goe,” head of Latin American security. Bob Goe is chief of the Latin American section of the Office of Intelligence.

A former high federal narcotics enforcement official, being interviewed on a different subject, volunteered that he had heard the files also were moved at during that week to Bell's office.

"I know first hand that when all this erupted (the allegations of Torrijos involvement in drug traffic), the files were moved from DEA to Justice," the source said. "I was told. There's no question about it."

A congressional source said he understood some material might have been put in Bell's office safe.

UPI also was told that on Oct. 11, a DEA secretary for routine reasons asked for a file labeled "Panama-Miami." She was denied the file and questioned for three hours by Fink's security division to find out if she was the source of a leak.

UPI was also told—again by congressional sources who said the material was coming from high in the DEA—that the Panamanian drug files allegedly contain information about members of Congress.

These sources said at least one current senator is named as receiving a campaign contribution that may have come from a foreign government and that the files hint of intelligence work done by DEA involving members of Congress.

Dole filed a Freedom of Information request with the DEA on Oct. 14, 1977, for material on the Panamanian drug allegations. He listed 45 specific files relating to the possible involvement of Torrijos, his family and his government in drug dealing.

After some delay, Dole received a 75-page report with none of the material requested. Dole said it was "heavily censored" and "almost totally sanitized."

"All I ended up with was a bunch of newspaper clippings," the senator said.

When Dole protested, Bensinger replied that DEA "was conforming to the specific request and direction of the Senate leadership of both parties that files regarding Panamanian officials and the family of Gen. Omar Torrijos be made available specifically to the Senate intelligence committee."

Bensinger told Dole: "We have complied fully with that directive and have furnished them complete file information. As we indicated at that time, Gen. Omar Torrijos has never been a target of investigation."

But, in an earlier letter to Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., Griffin Bell conceded Omar Torrijos was the object of a grand jury investigation.

Helms had written Bell in October enclosing a raw intelligence file naming Omar Torrijos and asking for information.

Bell responded that DEA learned CBS planned a report on the document, and the Justice Department public information office "informed CBS that a grand jury investigation based on the report had failed to produce any evidence linking the chief of state to the illegal drug traffic."

In practice, Bell said, "DEA and the Department of Justice should not give credibility to such hearsay allegations by announcing the steps, if any, taken to investigate them."

Bell said he therefore had instructed the Justice Department spokesmen to state that none of the allegations have resulted in investigations of Torrijos.

The order stuck: to this day the Justice Department refuses to state there was a grand jury investigation of Omar Torrijos.

Dole, on his return from Panama, wrote Bensinger that Omar Torrijos had promised to contact DEA and help the senator secure the drug files. But Bensinger replied with information about cooperation between the Panamanian authorities and the DEA on drugs. Dole fired back a letter saying, "I believe you misunderstood the point of my communication to you."

Bensinger then conceded there were two matters involved and suggested "with respect to DEA file material, I would again recommend that you contact the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence which has copies of all DEA files regarding this matter."

When UPI requested a briefing on the Panamanian drug situation from DEA, reporters were told there could be no questions about Torrijos.

UPI tried to contact Leland Riggs, a retired DEA agent who once attempted to arrest Moises Torrijos, about an affidavit the agent gave to Senate investigators.

A congressional source placed an introductory telephone call for the reporter. After declining to answer four calls from the reporter, Riggs told the congressional staffer he had received word from an individual in DEA whom he knew and trusted. Riggs said the DEA official cautioned him "not to talk to anybody except the Senate Intelligence Committee."

"I'm on ice," Riggs said.

UPI also sought to reach a DEA agent in Denver who had been involved in the investigation that led to the indictment of Moises Torrijos. The agent, Wilbur Place, said he needed permission from Bensinger before talking to anyone.

That, he conceded, was unlikely.

THE SECRET WAR AGAINST DOPE

(By Andrew Tully)

CHAPTER 10—DIPLOMATIC STEW

Cases like that of the heroin-carrying picture frames have caused United States Customs inspectors everywhere to adopt an amiably sardonic attitude toward their more glamorous colleagues in the investigative Customs Agency Service. The mostly anonymous inspectors, many of them now women, like to joke that the sleuths are "the first line of defense against junk—after us." In point of fact, this is true because the overwhelming majority of dope smugglers try to sneak their stuff into the United States through the legal channels provided by the Customs inspection routine. If the inspector misses the contraband in a suitcase or picture frame, the agent has no case. But in the past decade Customs inspectors have become more than just people in uniform who paw through a traveler's personal effects with infuriating care. They have been trained in their own investigative procedures. They have learned to recognize the smuggler's "profile," to be suspicious of numerous visa and entry stamps showing extensive travel, and to take a second look at an individual whose passport bears the seal of a country with a casual, if not corrupt, attitude toward smuggling. Among other characteristics, the average inspector tends to view with leery eye the wayfarer with diplomatic credentials. He has learned that some members of this elegant tribe are wily practitioners of the old shell game and that it is unwise to take them on faith. Thus the interest shown in a young Latin American who arrived in the United States on a summer evening in 1971.

As any poker expert can testify, a successful bluff depends to a large extent on an accurate appraisal of the other player's intelligence. Raphael Richard González, twenty-four, son of the Panamanian Ambassador to Nationalist China, was handsome and personable, but he was not very bright. It had never occurred to him, apparently, that United States Customs inspectors knew a thing or two about the international regulations applying to diplomatic passports.

When Richard arrived at New York's Kennedy International Airport from Panama shortly after 7 p.m. on July 8, 1971, he was carrying a diplomatic passport that showed he was a member of the ambassador's family. The passport bore a B-2 visa issued at the United States Embassy in Panama for multiple entries into the United States until August 31, 1974. With a special elegance befitting his position, Richard presented the passport to Customs Inspector Joseph Ania, who greeted him with the courteous respect due an envoy's son.

But if Ania was courtly, he also had the instinctive suspicion of his breed. He wondered about that multiple-entry visa and about Richard's luggage, which consisted of four large Samsonite suitcases and an attaché case.

"What's in your bags, sir?" Ania asked Richard.

"Summer clothing," replied Richard, abstractly.

Ania hefted one of the large suitcases. It seemed unusually heavy for a bag containing "summer clothing." He also noted that when he turned the suitcase from one end to the other, the contents shifted.

Customs, in the person of Inspector Joseph Ania, had good reason to be interested in travelers entering the United States from Panama. Despite the preceding eighteen months, the little "republic" operated by the strong man General Omar Torrijos had become one of the principal conduits for illicit dope trafficking aimed at the American market. One estimate was that as much as one-twelfth of the heroin used by American addicts passed through Panama, which means that approximately 20,000 drug users in the United States got their daily supply by this route.

Moreover, the Panama Canal Zone was an American military base, and law enforcement people were concerned over the statistic which revealed that one-third of the prison population in the Zone was incarcerated on drug charges. Diplomatically, too, there was the danger that the narcotics traffic could complicate months-old negotiations on a new Panamanian sovereignty over the 500-square mile Zone but keep the defense and operation of the canal under American control.

There was also gossip, some of which found its way into print in American newspapers, that cronies of General Torrijos and officials of his regime were involved in the heroin trafficking and were stashing huge profits in Swiss bank vaults. Thus Richard's diplomatic passport made him suspect rather than giving him the privileged respectability such a document commonly bestows on its holder. Customs had no desire to meddle in foreign policy, but the bureau willy-nilly had an official, obligatory curiosity about the baggage of potential smugglers.

"Would you mind opening your bags?" Ania asked Richard.

Richard politely demurred. Waving his passport languidly, he told Ania, "I have diplomatic immunity."

"I'm afraid not," replied Ania. "Your passport shows that neither your father nor you is accredited to the United States, only that your father is accredited to Taiwan. Immunity granted only by the country to which a diplomat is accredited."

There was a brief legal discussion. Then Richard informed Ania that, anyway, he was in transit to Madrid and therefore his luggage was subject to examination only when it reached its final destination. If that was true, Ania retorted, why was Richard's luggage not in the custody of Braniff Airlines for transshipment to Spain? Richard was unable to account for this. "It's the airline's fault," he said. At any rate, Richard was not about to stand still for an examination there and then of his luggage.

Inspector Ania went through channels. He notified Supervisory Inspector Leonard Simon of the impasse, and Simon escorted Richard to a small conference room for a little chat. Richard steadfastly refused to open his bags. He now explained that, anyway, he had lost the keys to the luggage. Thereupon, Simon dispatched an aide on an errand. The aide was back in a few minutes with a set of duplicate keys obtained from a large Customs collection at the airport.

Simon opened all four suitcases and the attaché case. None contained clothing or toilet articles. They did yield 140 plastic bags of white powder. A simple field test of the powder revealed a positive finding for heroin.

Special Agent John Giery was summoned, and he placed Richard under arrest for violation of the federal narcotics laws. After Richard had been informed of his rights under the Constitution, Agent Giery offered the young man some fatherly advice. Richard thought things over, then agreed to cooperate.

He told his interrogators that he had traveled from Panama with Nicolás Polanco, "a kind of bodyguard." Polanco, said Richard, had already cleared Customs and had observed his arrest from the "Fishbowl" area of the observation deck in the International Arrivals Building. Both Richard and Polanco had been instructed to contact the heroin shipper, an uncle of Richard's named Guillermo Alfonso González, López, upon their arrival in New York. Richard gave Agent Giery González's telephone number in Panama—645-357.

An alert was placed with the New York Telephone Company to put a hold on any calls to the Panama number. Meanwhile, according to Richard's instructions, the agents checked the young man into Room 897 of the McAlpin Hotel at 34th Street and Broadway.

At about 10 p.m., Customs got a call from the telephone company. Agents forthwith descended on a public telephone booth at 42nd Street and Eighth Avenue. There they arrested Polanco while he was waiting to get through to González. An agent hung up the phone for Polanco. Customs hoped to have its own little chat with González, later, an eventuality Polanco's warning call would have thwarted.

Thus when agents escorted Richard to his room at the McAlpin about midnight, they were delighted to hear the telephone ringing. Richard had his instructions. When the caller turned out, as he hoped, to be González, he told his uncle, "Everything is okay."

The agents heard González ask Richard why he was so late checking into the hotel.

"I got lost," Richard told him. He also informed his uncle that Polanco, by then incarcerated in a cell in the Federal House of Detention, was "downstairs getting a sandwich."

"Okay," González told Richard. "I'm leaving on a Lan-Chile flight arriving at ten o'clock this morning at Kennedy. Stay in your room and wait for me."

As the official Customs report put it: "Arrangements were made in New York for the expected arrival of Guillermo González." Some arrangements. A call was put through to the Customs office in Miami, and instructions were given to the agent in charge there to put a man on the plane González would be taking to New York. Thanks to Richard, the Miami office could be provided with description of the youth's uncle—Panamanian, five feet, five inches tall, slim build, about 135 pounds, mustache, black hair, white complexion, forty-two to forty-six years of age.

Then Richard talked some more. He told his interrogators he had made five previous flights from Panama to the United States with heroin in his luggage—four in the fall of 1970 and one in January, 1971. On all these flights, Richard said, González accompanied him as "bodyguard."

González arrived at Kennedy Airport at 11:30 a.m. via Miami. Unknown to González, it was a couple of Customs agents who escorted him to a taxicab operated by Special Agent Mario Sessa. González told Sessa to take him to the McAlpin Hotel. En route, the Panamanian informed Sessa that he had a friend in the Hotel Edison and asked if Sessa knew the Edison address. Sessa gave him the address. González thanked him and remarked that he must remember to call his friend that night.

Upon his arrival at the McAlpin, González went directly to Room 897, where he greeted Richard and made some small talk. Then, with Customs men eavesdropping, González told his nephew to place a call to the Hotel Edison. When the call was put through González took the phone and was connected with an Oscar San Martin in Room 834. González and San Martin arranged to meet in the bar of the Edison within the hour. When González hung up, he was arrested by agents who had been sequestered in an adjoining room.

Like Richard, González was willing to talk. He explained that his arrangement with San Martin for delivery of the heroin required him to place the four suitcases and attaché case in the locked trunk of a rented car, then leave the car in a public parking lot and deliver the parking ticket to San Martin. Ten minutes later, agents had rented a car and stashed Richard's luggage in the trunk. Under surveillance, González drove to a parking lot at 1250 Broadway where he left the car, then set off to deliver the parking ticket to San Martin.

With Customs men still dogging his footsteps, González dutifully arrived at the Hotel Edison, where he met San Martin and turned over the ticket. With González and his guardian agents standing by, San Martin placed a phone call from the hotel lobby. González then departed with his agents, while other Customs men remained to keep an eye on San Martin. Within a few minutes, a man later identified as Américo Altamirano arrived at the Edison and had a brief conversation with San Martin, after which San Martin returned to his hotel room under surveillance.

Agents followed Altamirano to a building at 310 West 47th Street. He left the building several minutes later, accompanied by a man later identified as his brother, César. The brothers walked around in aimless fashion for more than twenty minutes before arriving at the lot where the rented car was parked. There they separated, with César proceeding to the parking lot office while Américo strolled about in the immediate neighborhood.

César presented the parking ticket to a uniformed attendant named Duane Lane, whose full-time job was special agent of the Bureau of Customs. Lane drove the rented car from its space and delivered it to his customer. Then, as César attempted to climb into the car, he was arrested. When César refused to talk, his brother, Américo, was arrested on a nearby street. At about the same time, agents arrested San Martin at the Hotel Edison.

It was a little after 4 p.m. on July 9, 1971. It had taken Customs less than twenty-four hours to round up all six persons involved in the smuggling attempt. Agents had seized 151 pounds of pure heroin with a street value estimated at up to $27,000,000—enough to supply the habit of every addict in New York City for almost a month.

The apprehension of Guillermo Alfonso González López also provided the Customs' Intelligence Division with some raw intelligence to be squirreled away for possible use on another day, in another case with diplomatic ramifications. On González' person were found various papers and an address book, which, in Customs' carefully calculated—and absolutely necessary—double-talk, "indicated" that González had had "associations with" some big names in Latin-American governmental and diplomatic circles, including at least one head of state, at least two ambassadors, assorted Cabinet ministers, and a couple of high-ranking military officers.

As one Customs official put it: "All these names make fascinating reading, but we couldn't lay a glove on their owners even if we had admissible evidence. They're a problem for their own countries unless they get in trouble on American soil and even then we probably couldn't hold them. In the meantime, we're not in the business of toppling foreign governments no matter what kind of creeps they have running their stores."

Besides, Customs at the time was preoccupied with its part in the final disposition of the case of Raphael Richard, et al. As receiver of the heroin, Oscar San Martin drew the stiffest penalty—a twelve-year prison sentence on each of three indictment counts, to run concurrently. González, the operation manager, got seven years in the pen, and Richard three and a half years after both pleaded nolo contendere. Américo and César Altamirano each got two years, but charges against Richard's bodyguard, Nicola Polanco, were dismissed by the United States Attorney's office after he had served almost six months in jail awaiting trial.

Meanwhile, however, Congress had become inquisitive about the drug situation in Panama, and in March, 1972, Customs' intelligence on official Panamanian involvement in heroin trafficking became a matter of public record. The vehicle of this exposé was a draft report by the unlikely Panama Canal subcommittee of the House

Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee headed by Representative John M. Murphy, Democrat, of New York.

The connection lay in the fact that the subcommittee had been studying and conducting hearings on the United States position in Panama vis-a-vis the future operation of the Panama Canal and jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. Among the experts to which the subcommittee turned was Customs Commissioner Myles J. Ambrose, who arranged a briefing for the panel by a group of special agents on January 24.

In a far-ranging review, the briefing agents cited some chapter and verse on thirty major heroin seizure cases during the preceding eighteen months. The seizures ranged from 13 pounds to several hundred pounds, and five of the seizures—or one-sixth of the total—involved the Republic of Panama. According to the subcommittee's draft report, "The briefing team concluded that based on the Customs investigation" the Richard case "reached into the highest levels of Panamanian officialdom and included Moises Torrijos, the brother of General Omar Torrijos, and the Panamanian Foreign Minister, Juan Tack."

The report on the briefing also noted that Nicolás Polanco, Richard's bodyguard, was a chauffeur for Richard's uncle Guillermo González, and that González was a longtime friend and former bodyguard of Moises Torrijos. Added the report: "The Customs agents claimed that because Richard's father was in Taiwan at the time of these transactions that he got his diplomatic passport from Moises, who had access to them as a Panamanian ambassador. Customs confirmed the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs' report that Juan Tack had signed the diplomatic passport."

Although the subcommittee acknowledged that narcotics trafficking was "basically an American problem run, in part, by Americans and criminals in other countries . . . as in every other part of the world, local nationals and officials succumb to the enticement of easy money and are lured into the drug traffic. This has happened in Panama."

The subcommittee was almost as rough on the State Department, which it charged "has had an historic policy of ignoring or denying the involvement in the narcotics traffic into the United States of high-ranking officials of friendly foreign governments . . . The question is [whether] the United States is negotiating a treaty that involves a 70-year, five-billion-dollar U.S. commitment, not to mention the security of the United States and this hemisphere, with a government that condones or is actually involved in a drug-running operation into the United States."

Although it flopped, the Richard caper combined two smuggling methods—one as old as international relations and the other a product of the jet age. A proper diplomatic passport has been the perfect laissez-passer for the carrier of contraband since the days of ancient Canaan. Travel by commercial airline enables the dope supplier in Marseilles to promise speedy, often same day delivery to the wholesaler in New York, Miami or Chicago, and payment within a matter of days. It has brought to the narcotics trade the rapid turnover of the supermarket.

However he travels, an accredited diplomat's person and baggage are safe from customs inspection. The same is true of the individual traveling with a head of state or a high government leader paying an official visit to a foreign country, no matter how clerkly his status. By courtesy and tradition, none of the visiting team's baggage is examined; and, of course, the diplomatic "pouch"—which might be as big as a piano box—is always inviolate. Occasionally, however, authorities are able to gather enough evidence of suspicious associations to move against even these privileged persons, in what might be called "the international interest"—for want of a handier term.

EXCERPTS FROM REPORT ON ACTIVITIES DURING THE 92D CONGRESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

AN OVERVIEW OF THE NARCOTICS PROBLEM IN PANAMA

One of the most pressing problems facing the United States—drug use and drug trafficking—has apparently not been overlooked by the young Americans in the Panama Canal Zone. According to reports coming to the Subcommittee, young dependents of military and civilian families "turn on" to "Panama Red", the local brand of marijuana, as readily as their counterparts in the United States turn to similar hallucinogenic drugs. A large percentage of the prison population in the Canal Zone is being held on drug charges.

Subcommittee investigators have been told that American G.I.'s have sought assignment to Panama because of the easy availability of cheap high grade dope. And this is not a recent development. As far back as 1968 members of the 101st Airborne Division reportedly volunteered for duty at the jungle training schools in Panama because of the lure of drugs. The Subcommittee has been told by U.S. drug law enforcement officers that the Panamanians have complained about the use of marijuana by U.S. troops and have charged that our G.I.'s have corrupted Panamanian troops by introducing them to drug use during what they ironically describe as "joint" maneuvers.

Since a clamp-down on major Mexican airports, Panama has become the conduit through which passes enormous quantities of dope—an estimated one twelfth of the heroin in a recent one year period—used by U.S. addicts. This means that at one point in time roughly 20,000 American drug addicts were getting their daily supply by this route. Large quantities of cocaine have also transited the Zone into this country.

With the increase in heroin and cocaine coming through the Canal Zone, the possibility of drug epidemics that have plagued our military bases and the dependents of both military and civilian support personnel in most parts of the world is a constant threat. This happened for example, in the sprawling U.S. air base, Ching Chuan Kang (CCK), Taiwan, on Okinawa, in the Philippines, and, of course, on a massive scale in Vietnam. Wherever this happens, our military strength is sapped, our image before the people of the host countries is tarnished and our capabilities to operate defense positions and vital installations such as the Panama Canal are diminished.

Given the sensitive nature of our current relations with Panama, we cannot afford to have the picture distorted by the use of drugs or the activities of mercenary American nationals, "soldier of fortune" pilots, and others who are making small fortunes by running thousands of pounds of the world's illicit dope through the Republic of Panama. There are, of course, many points surrounding the United States where criminals transship narcotics into the United States—but these areas do not have a canal vital to the defense and commerce of the Americas and the entire world.

As Chairman Garmatz of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee said in mandating the Subcommittee, we must keep abreast of all of those factors affecting the smooth and efficient operation of the Canal.

The narcotics traffic is a threat to our people there, to their children, to the American image in that country and to the relationships between our two countries. We must not let international dope peddlers and drug traffickers imperil the American position in Panama. It should be and must be stopped as quickly as possible and the Subcommittee intends to see that the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs Panama Task Force does this as quickly and efficiently as they did in Okinawa where a special BNDD led task force arrested 71 traffickers in nine months—mostly American servicemen and dependents—and all but wiped out the traffic on that island which contains 50,000 U.S. troops and civilians.

The Subcommittee in no way wishes to cast all of the blame on Panama or its officials for the sudden emergence of Panama as a pipeline for heroin and other drugs into the United States. It is basically an American problem run, in part, by Americans and criminals in other countries. * * *

Another case which prompted the original BNDD assessment of Panamanian official involvement centered around Joaquin Him Gonzales, a notorious smuggler who was arrested in the Canal Zone by U.S. authorities on February 6, 1971. Within two weeks he was brought to Dallas, Texas, for his active participation in the drug market and tried for conspiracy.

Him Gonzalez was international transit chief at Panama's Tocumen Airport and he used his high position to protect shipments of drugs to the United States. He was accused on this occasion of sending to Dallas somewhat over a million dollars worth of heroin. Gonzalez was allegedly a Torrijos protege and this relationship was made clear when the Panamanian Government mobilized all its resources, something it had not done until that point, for the offender to be returned to Panama. Reports in the press cited the "angry outburst" and "outraged" protest of the Panamanian Government—led by Juan Tack—over the arrest of Gonzalez.

An indication of the duplicity of certain Panamanian officials is found in a comparison of their public statements and their private or official actions in this regard. For example, in October 1972, Colonel Manuel Moriega, the Intelligence Chief of the National Guard, proclaimed a desire for Panama to become the enforcement center for fighting the drug traffic in Latin America. Yet that same month intelligence reports of the United States Government sustains the 1971 BNDD assessment and we still find that Panamanian officials and security agents are allegedly involved in narcotics trafficking. A similar "offer" was made on April 8, 1972, which received worldwide publicity. However, U.S. officials, when questioned by the Subcommittee, were unaware of any direct contact by the Panamanian Government which would have brought this about.

The arrest of Manuel Rojas Sucre, the nephew of Panama's Vice President Arturo Sucre at Kennedy International Airport on December 3, 1972, with cocaine, liquid hashish, and a diplomatic passport (his mother is Panama's consul general in Montreal) is further indication of a need for continued efforts by the United States Government to impress upon the Panamanians the seriousness with which we view the drug problem.

THE POSITION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The State Department has had a history policy of ignoring or denying the involvement in the narcotics traffic into the United States of high-ranking officials of friendly foreign governments.

While the Department has taken a "soft" approach to the narcotics problem generally, in Panama it has reached an absurd extreme. For example, the Subcommittee was told by the director of the BNDD that as a result of the strong Panamanian objections to the arrest of Him Gonzalez it is highly doubtful that the State Department would ever again allow the arrest of a Panamanian national in the Canal Zone; BNDD agents claimed the Panamanians were only paying lip service to narcotic drug enforcement and that the big trafficking was going on full tilt with the knowledge, sanction and even involvement of certain Panamanian officials and Guardia members.

After a preliminary Subcommittee report was released in March of 1972, on the involvement of Panama's Foreign Minister and others in that government in the narcotics traffic, three BNDD agents assigned to work out of the U.S. Embassy in Panama City were declared persona non grata and given 12 hours to leave the country. This ultimatum was delivered on national television by Foreign Minister Juan Tack. This was done after Tack had arranged for the agents to sign letters written by the U.S. Ambassador in Panama denying they had discussed with the Chairman of this Subcommittee the relationship of government officials of Panama to narcotics smuggling into the United States. In subsequent testimony before this Subcommittee, one of the agents stated that he had, in fact, discussed with staff members of the Subcommittee such high-level involvement. There were public denials by various administration agency heads of the charges made in the Subcommittee report—the most heated coming from the Department of State. However, a recent government document supplied to the Subcommittee compiled from information and intelligence gathered by the several agencies with a responsibility for international narcotic law enforcement reached the following conclusion on the so-called "Latin connection":

"Generally speaking, the greatest detriment to effective enforcement in Latin America is corruption. The corruption goes all the way to the top of some Latin American governments. One of the more glaring examples of official corruption is the country of Panama. . . ."

This Subcommittee is in accord with the proposal made by the authors of this report when they concluded:

" . . . Because of the known involvement of Panamanian government officials in the international narcotics traffic, the U.S. Government should take a firm stand in the current negotiation of a new treaty for the continued use of the Panama Canal Zone.

"The new treaty should continue to vest authority for the Canal Zone in the Canal Zone Police. The U.S. should not abrogate its authority to arrest fugitives from the U.S. who appear in the Zone, regardless of their nationality. The U.S. should not forego the right to remove such fugitives to the appropriate federal jurisdiction. By taking a strong stand, the U.S. will continue to provide adequate protection to the large number of U.S. citizens who reside in the Canal Zone. It will also prevent international traffickers from obtaining refuge in the Zone as they now do in Panama. More importantly, it will also demonstrate to the rest of the continent that the U.S. is completely serious about controlling the flow of narcotics into the country. It is recognized that by taking this stand, the Government of Panama will attempt to retaliate by creating incidents similar to those that occurred in 1964."

In summary, the Department of State has put a higher priority on placating an increasingly hostile and demanding regime in Panama than it has on taking a firm stand against government that is a major factor in allowing the international flow of heroin and cocaine presently inundating the United States. This is in spite of a wealth of evidence and intelligence that would dictate a firmer course of action.

The question that has apparently been left for the Congress to answer is: Is the United States negotiating a treaty that involves a 70 year—5 billion dollar U.S. investment, not to mention the security of the United States and this hemisphere with a government that condones or is actually involved in a drug-running operation into the United States?

In view of the weak reaction of the Department of State to the narcotics traffic in Panama, it is the conclusion of this Subcommittee that it is incumbent on the Subcommittee to let the Congress—and in turn the Panamanians—know that the United States will not tolerate the use of diplomatic channels and the attendant immunity to be used to funnel drugs into this country.

COMMUNIST CUBA TO BACK PANAMA

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, appearing in the Miami, Florida paper, the Diario Las Americas, was an article written in Spanish that has been of great concern to people who oppose the canal treaty. I have translated this and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record. I hope that my colleagues in the Senate will read it and I hope they will pay a little more attention to the proximity of Cuba to the Panama Canal and the proximity of other countries not exactly friendly to the United States who while they want the canal to continue to operate, would probably take up the defense of what the Panamanians would call an intervention by the United States if and when it becomes necessary for us to defend the canal. There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

COMMUNIST CUBA TO BACK PANAMA

MEXICO CITY, D.F., January 28.—Cuban Foreign Minister Isidoro Maimierca stated that Cuba would back Panama militarily if the people of that country were to request assistance to defend themselves against a U.S. aggression.

"We will aid any government that requests it in order to fight for its independence and social justice," added Malmierca who is here to share in the work of a Cuba-Mexico Joint Commission.

Within this ideological framework, the Cuban Foreign Minister stated that his country's troops would remain in Angola until that country's security had been assured "against the racist armies of South Africa and Zaire."

Malmierca also stated that Latin American integration "is a permanent aspiration of the Cuban revolution" but much progress yet remains to be made.

Finally, Malmierca stated his "dismay" at the presence of U.S. troops in Guantamo and the possible intervention of the U.S. Navy in the Panama Canal.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES CLOSED SESSION DEBATE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, at 10 o'clock, the Senate will go into closed session to discuss and hear discussed and perhaps hear the record on certain allegations involving General Torrijos' alleged drug trafficking.

Mr. President, as one who is very concerned about this, I would hope that following the closed session, whether it ends today, tomorrow, or whenever, the Senate would, in its wisdom, vote to make that information available to the public. There might be some exceptions, if there is any possibility that someone's life might be endangered or someone might be exposed to physical harm.

But having traveled around the country a great deal in the past 10 days, there is a great interest in the Panama Canal debate across the country. Some are for the treaties; some are opposed to the treaties; and some have not made up their minds.

It seems to the Senator from Kansas that one way to discourage the American people is to somehow keep secret information that should be made available.

The Senator from Kansas said on a number of occasions that there is not any direct bearing or direct connection between the alleged drug trafficking and the treaties themselves. The Senator from Kansas never made that charge. But I can say as far as the American people are concerned there is a direct bearing because, as I sense the mood of the American people, they do not want us voting for the treaties if, in fact, there is some connection between drug trafficking and General Torrijos.

So it would seem to me, as we prepare to go into closed session, there are a number of questions that must be addressed.

We must determine whether General Torrijos has ever been "the subject"—as distinguished from "the target"—of an investigation by either the U.S. Justice Department, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, or a U.S. grand jury, with respect to illegal Panamanian drug operations. If so, we should know the results of that investigation and if not why not, considering the several allegations contained within DEA files.

We should also address the question whether or not General Torrijos if not a direct participant is in any way aiding, abetting, protecting, or tolerating illegal drug traffic passing through Panama.

If there is a sealed indictment, as there now appears to be, involving the brother of General Torrijos, Moises Torrijos, as a coconspirator in illegal drug operations, is there additional evidence in the possession of the DEA that Moises Torrijos is guilty of drug trafficking? What elements of this matter were discussed between John Ingersoll, Director of U.S. Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, and Omar Torrijos in Panama on June 22, 1972?

Does the Senate Intelligence Committee have possession of all 45 DEA files on the list supplied by this Senator, including so-called DEACON and DEACON 2 files? Who do they suggest about the participation by the Torrijos family and other Panamanian Government officials in illegal narcotics operations? What information do they contain regarding connections between Omar Torrijos and Cuban President Fidel Castro?

These are some of the basic questions that hopefully will be addressed in the closed session which is about to commence.

But, I think, finally, the American people have a right to know as much as possible and, unless the motion is made by some other Senator, the Senator from Kansas intends to move that we lift the cloak of secrecy insofar as we can pertaining to the evidence revealed to other Senators on the floor at 10 o'clock.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Morgan). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE U.S. FUTURE AND THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, last month, at Endicott College, former Senator Henry Cabot Lodge made a very sensible and compelling speech in support of the Panama Canal Treaties. He stressed our political, security, and commercial interests in the new treaties and warned that failure to ratify them "would surely poison our relations with the whole Latin American world." I commend this speech, from an elder statesman of Massachusetts, to all my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE U.S. FUTURE AND THE PANAMA CANAL

President Carter has asked the Senate to ratify two separate treaties. One is the Panama Canal Treaty which provides for the administration of the canal by the United States for the rest of this century (after which it goes to Panama). The other treaty, known as the Neutrality Treaty, guarantees that the canal will be open and neutral permanently, both during and after the period covered by the Panama Canal Treaty. It gives the United States the power to act in defense of the Canal's neutrality in time of need.

Supporting President Carter's request is former President Ford, former Secretary of State Kissinger and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Four Presidents have recommended that the treaty of 1903 be changed and brought up to date. I am supporting the President.

Let me say that when a President makes a proposal in the complicated field of foreign affairs he is entitled to have the benefit of the doubt—at least at the outset. After all, he knows things that we do not know. Later, as we gain in knowledge and experience, we may conclude that the President is wrong, but, at the beginning, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt.

Our relations with the Panama Canal are governed by the Treaty of 1903 which said that the U.S. in Panama would be "as if we were sovereign". But we never were actually sovereign and we did not want to be. So there is no question of "giving up our sovereignty" over territory which belongs to us, like Alaska or the Louisiana territory. The crucial question is whether we shall so conduct ourselves that we incur the hatred, rather than the respect, of Latin America. That—rather than "sovereignty"—is truly important.

The present state of affairs should be changed. It makes enemies for us. After all, there is no need for the United States to run the courts, the schools, the street cleaning, and the fire department in Panama—and we do not do so. But in the Canal Zone, which is a ten mile swath of about 600 square miles and which cuts the country in two, we do run the local government. Understandably this seems unreasonable and somewhat colonial to the Panamanians.

We Americans can be proud of the Panama Canal. The building of it was surely one of the greatest adventures of all times. Nothing else in history even remotely equals it. If you exclude the two World Wars, it was much the biggest and costliest effort that was ever mounted and it affected the lives of tens of thousands of people throughout the world. It was the "moonshot" of the early 20th century.

Now, here we are after 74 years under the Treaty of 1903, and Panama is entering a new phase which has already split public opinion. I believe that the long-headed and sagacious thing to do is to ratify these two treaties.

Remember that the canal will not be turned over to Panama until the year 2000, that the permanent right of the U.S. to defend the canal is specifically assured in the treaty and that today the largest supertankers and U.S. aircraft carriers are too big to pass through the canal, but a sea level canal probably could handle the biggest ships.

I have also heard the statement made that the US taxpayers should not have to pay the Panamanians to take the canal back. This is not going to happen: the payments to be made to Panama for the use of its territory will come from canal tolls, not the US taxpayer. As the Joint Chiefs have repeatedly stressed, US military—and commercial—interests in the canal are interested in its use, not in who owns it.

A statement of General Marshall's, although made in another context, is pertinent here. He said that national security is achieved not just by military power, necessary though that sometimes is, but also by actions which subtract from the number of one's potential enemies and which add to the number of one's potential friends. I believe that in the case of Panama, we need good will for us, throughout Latin America, and do not need the real estate in Panama.

If this pending effort to remove the appearance of colonialism by ratifying the two treaties were to fail, such failure would surely poison our relations with the whole Latin American world. It might well involve our troops in the Canal Zone in an expensive guerrilla warfare with Panamanian rebels. Viet Nam should have taught us how costly a guerrilla war can be. We would in such a case be paying an enormous price in order to keep our special position in the Canal Zone, a position which we are better off without.

On the other hand, to transfer ownership of the canal to Panama would tend to give us new friends and reduce the number of our enemies. To me, this course, even though it is not easy to do, is the constructive course to follow.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) is recognized to make a motion with regard to the treaty on which there shall be 30 minutes under the control of the Senator from Alabama, with the quorum call not to come out of the 30 minutes time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Alabama may yield to me for not to exceed 5 minutes, without the time being charged against him.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will yield, of course, with the proviso I not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized on that basis.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, the Senate, in closed session, over a period of somewhere between 9 and 10 hours yesterday and 4 hours today, has completed a full and detailed discussion of investigations undertaken by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence in regard to certain issues, which I have referred to heretofore as peripheral issues, which have become involved in the debate on the Panama Canal treaties.

The committee specifically and in detail examined several issues which were alleged to have a bearing on the Panama Canal treaties now being considered by the Senate.

First, the committee investigated charges that, because of some of the U.S. intelligence operations in Panama, Panamanian authorities pressured our negotiators and, as a result, somehow extracted a better deal on certain provisions of the treaties.

Second, the committee exhaustively investigated charges of drug trafficking by members of the Torrijos family, and others, and the allegations that these charges in some way had a bearing on the outcome of the treaty negotiations.

Third, the committee intensively investigated charges of payoffs which were alleged to have been sought by high-level executive and legislative branch officials in return for arranging certain increases in the annuity to be paid Panama under the treaty.

The chairman of the Intelligence Committee, Mr. Bayh, set forth in great detail the committee's findings with respect to these charges and the vice chairman, Mr. Goldwater, participated actively in the proceedings. The committee's findings have been fully related to the Members of the Senate during the course of this debate and the findings on the allegations were negative on all counts.

My understanding of the information presented to the Senate leads me to these conclusions:

First, there is no evidence showing that U.S. intelligence operations had any bearing on the outcome of the negotiations leading to the formulation of the treaties.

Second, there is no evidence that would stand up in any U.S. court of law linking General Torrijos to any illegal narcotics operation of any kind. In addition, there is no evidence that the committee has been able to find to suggest that the drug issue, in general, had any bearing whatsoever on the final outcome of the negotiations.

Finally, there is absolutely no evidence, in spite of intensive investigation, that any legislative or executive official ever sought any payoff or kickbacks of any kind whatsoever.

Mr. President, these findings are extremely important and should put to rest the charges that have been made, the allegations that have been made, and with which the Senate has dealt at great length during these 2 days. These allegations, innuendoes, and insinuations have been, at best, remote issues peripheral to the essential question: Are these treaties in the best interest of the United States?

Mr. President, I commend the chairman of the Intelligence Committee, Mr. Bayh, and the vice chairman, Mr. Goldwater, and all members of that committee, for their exhaustive and tireless investigations and for their detailed presentation of the committee's findings. The Senate is deeply indebted to the committee. It is my hope, Mr. President, with these investigations behind us and with presentation of the report which Chairman Bayh has made, that the Senate can now proceed with its debate on the treaties and can contend with the real issues that go to the merit of the treaties.

I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, do I have any time remaining of my 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises that the 5-minute period has expired.

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) be allotted 5 minutes under the same conditions in which the majority leader just spoke.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished minority leader have 5 minutes, under the same conditions.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I would like 5 minutes, following Senator Baker.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection, under the same conditions.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator from Michigan for letting me go ahead.

Mr. President, I only wish to say that I am pleased that the Senate went forward with this rather extended closed session.

As I indicated to the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole) when he suggested this some time ago at a Republican policy luncheon, I think it is imperative that all Members of the Senate have available a forum where they can freely discuss all the facts available to the Intelligence Committee. I think that has been done. I do not know what the final result will be.

I, of course, will look forward to the Senate's final determination on this issue. I think this will be helpful.

I, too, commend Senator Bayh, the chairman of the Intelligence Committee, and Senator Goldwater, the vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee for their diligence, their careful preparation, and their presentation to the Senate.

One of the reasons I sought to amend these treaties, in cosponsorship with the distinguished majority leader and 76 other Members of the Senate, rather than agree to a memorandum of understanding between President Carter and General Torrijos, is that, under circumstances such as these, I felt that it was imperative that we deal government to government; that, on the one hand, the amendment should originate in the Senate as a formal action by this body. By the very nature of things, amendments would require the formal institutional concurrence of the government of Panama.

I reiterate, Mr. President, that we are not dealing here with General Torrijos or his brother. We are dealing with the Republic of Panama, and I know of no charges against that country.

I believe that the amendments proposed by the distinguished majority leader, by me, and by 76 others fully take into account all difficulties that have been discussed in this session.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) is recognized for 5 minutes, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

MR. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I was surprised, frankly, that arrangements were made to cut into Senator Allen's time and would be on this subject and of this nature, expressing conclusions regarding the closed session. But since that is the case, I should like to raise a procedural point.

I want to be sure that the transcript of these secret sessions, so-called, when it is made available—and there has been a unanimous-consent agreement that a sanitized version will be made available in 72 hours—be an actual transcript of what has been said here and not a revised version.

I say that because this Senator is among the guilty from time to time in taking the transcript and embellishing on what he said and perhaps adding an argument here or subtracting an argument there, as the convenience is. But there is one important difference.

In those open sessions, the press is covering what we say. In this closed session, no one on the outside knows what is going on, if we are able to rewrite the Record.

The majority leader has made arrangements, under a unanimous-consent agreement, that each Senator who participated will have a period of time to edit his remarks.

I ask the majority leader if it is the understanding that the intent of the rules will be observed strictly and that the committee that has been appointed to sanitize the Record will also review the transcript, to see that Senators are confined to punctuation and grammatical changes and that there are no changes of substance so far as the transcript is concerned.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I would hope that would be the case; that Senators would confine themselves to making grammatical corrections only and would not add arguments pro or con in relation to the issues that have been raised and discussed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is the committee charged with the responsibility of seeing that we will have that kind of transcript? It seems to me that that is very important.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator was here last evening when I entered the request, and there was no objection to it. I cannot speak for the committee. So far as I am concerned, I will not even look at the transcript. I did not have much to say. I sat and listened a bit. I will not even go and look at it. So far as I am concerned, we can agree by unanimous consent that no Senator be allowed to make any changes other than that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the majority leader.

Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the original transcript of the proceedings of the closed session, as edited by each participating Senator, be retained and that the appointed committee review the editing by each Senator, as well as the sanitizing for security purposes, before the transcript is released.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reservation is heard.

Mr. BAYH. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—as the chairman of this committee, who has been involved in an almost round-the-clock debate for the last couple of days, I enthusiastically support the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan. I feel that that really was the thrust of the majority leader's motion in the first place. We want to get all the information out for the American people which will not jeopardize lives and jeopardize the security of the country.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator from Indiana. I am glad he agrees.

I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Michigan has made this request. This has long been a bug in my bonnet, that we are allowed to go backstage and change our remarks, not just change the punctuation and grammar, but that we are completely able to reedit what has been said and put in things that have not been said.

I recall that at one time last year I made a prolonged speech on the B-1, and the next day in the Record I saw a reply from a colleague, indicating that he had debated me. He was not even on the floor.

So I hope we will not only make this a rule for this one instance but also that we can adopt this as a rule, that we can correct nothing but grammar.

As far as that goes, I have more confidence in the Official Reporters of Debates than in my own staff, to correct my poor grammar and my poor punctuation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is especially important in a closed session, which is not open to the public or the press.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I will not object—let us just read the whole request, so it is in the Record. I made this request in order that the press might have available to it, at the very earliest hour possible, the transcript of the closed session.

If the Senator will allow me, under a reservation of objections, and I do not intend to object, the unanimous-consent request which was made and granted was as follows:

That at the conclusion of the closed-door session a complete transcript of the proceedings be personally delivered in a sealed envelope by the chief reporter to the Secretary of the Senate; that until Thursday noon, tomorrow noon, the transcript of the remarks of each Senator who participated in the debate be made available by the Secretary of the Senate, under his direction, only to said Senators, not to staff, but to said Senators, for revision of their said remarks and that for this purpose the transcript be secured in room S-406 of the Capitol, the Office of Classified National Security Information; and further, that the staff of the Intelligence Committee be authorized under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, or his designee, the chairman and ranking member of that committee, meaning Mr. Bayh and Mr. Goldwater, and the minority leader and the majority leader, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. Sarbanes), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church), and appropriate persons from the executive branch, to sanitize the completed remarks in that same room, S-406 of the Capitol, and that when such sanitization is completed the sanitized version of the closed-session remarks be released to the news media no later than 50 hours after the conclusion of the closed session.

That request was granted.

I compliment the Senator from Michigan on his concern and on the requests that he has now made. I do not think any arguments pro or con ought to be made by any Senator.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Or ought to be added.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Pardon?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Senator does not think they should be added.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They should not be added. Yes. I do not think any arguments pro or con ought to be made by way of addition to those to the transcript.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And in view of the fact that Mr. Griffin is going to be one of those Senators selected to oversee the sanitization of this transcript, I am confident that no arguments pro or con will be added, and I congratulate the Senator. I not only do not object, but I join him in making the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, if I have any time remaining on my 5 minutes, I just thank the majority leader. I am sure that that is what he intended by the original agreement, but if there were any misunderstanding each Senator is on notice now that except for grammatical and punctuation changes, and so forth, no change in substance of the transcript will be permitted.

I yield to the Senator from Utah, if I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired, and by previous agreement the Senator from New York (Mr. Javits) is recognized at this time.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have 5 minutes. I happily yield a minute to my colleague and friend from Utah.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is fine.

Mr. JAVITS. Go ahead, I say to Senator Garn. I just yielded a minute to him.

Mr. GARN. I thought the Senator meant after he finished.

I thank the Senator very much.

I cannot help but stand and respond to the distinguished majority leader's analysis of the closed session. The majority leader is accurate when he says that no evidence was reported that would hold up in court, but I do not want the impression left from his remarks that there was not a great deal of evidence, and I speak as a member of the Intelligence Committee, of overwhelming circumstantial and hearsay evidence, and I admit that any reasonable person in the country who had the opportunity to read all of it would conclude that the Torrijos brothers and many other high Panamanian officials were involved in drug traffic.

I just do not want that impression. It is a legalistic point of view.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GARN. Let me finish. I am on Senator Javits' time.

I also would make one other remark that, where we are passing this off, what we are dealing with is a corrupt illegal dictatorship, just like we do in Korea and Vietnam.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

The Senator from New York, Senator Javits.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have only 4 minutes, if the Senator will forgive me.

Mr. LEAHY. I shall make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. JAVITS. Sure.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon the completion of the time of the Senator from New York, I have 3 minutes under the standing agreement we have.

Mr. JAVITS. Perhaps Senator Bayh would like 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYH. Perhaps the Senator from Indiana should be heard from under the same circumstances, if there is no objection, not to exceed 5 minutes in deference to our friend from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to either of the requests of the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Indiana?

The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise, first to thank Senator Allen for his customary courtesy and, then, because I have participated in this aspect of the debate both before the Foreign Relations Committee and here on the floor, both in the open and in executive closed-door session, to make this point which I think is critical. I used these words and I use them again. Torrijos is no angel. He is a military dictator. And I have little doubt that there are very few angels that one can find in any country in high office particularly any more than Panama. And I have little doubt, too, that there is a good deal that went on here in the narcotics traffic.

It is said that it has been materially improved, and I think Senator Bayh is a very reliable authority on this, and that is to the good.

But what I have sought to make very clear is let us not lose the main point. Let us remember that one of the most traditional ways of trying to beat something is by trying to discredit it on a totally collateral issue, and that is all I said about this.

The fact is that this is a treaty for 23 years and then it is succeeded by a treaty in perpetuity, all of which binds the people of Panama and the people of the United States. I will not be here. Many of the rest of us will not be here. And Torrijos will not be there probably, and many of the people who are with him now will not be there:

The question is, therefore: Are the peoples bound and is this good for the United States?

And those of us who contend for the treaty say, one, the plebiscite binds the people of Panama just as we are bound once the Senate acts and the necessary implementing legislation is passed and, second, this is good for the United States because the alternatives are all too dire and our opponents never deal with the alternatives. They just assume that we are still in 1903, when you can pull off these deals. Well, you cannot. It is 75 years later. And the alternative, Mr. President, is Mozambique, Rhodesia, South Africa, and all of the chaos which we see in the world.

Here the people of Panama have enough discipline and enough patriotism to bind themselves for 23 years substantially to continue the present situation.

This seems to me to be the acid test of the reasonableness with which the people of Panama down there are faced, and I deeply believe the people of our own country ought to be just as reasonable.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, under the previous order, now recognizes the Senator from Vermont.

MR. LEAHY. Mr. President, I will be brief.

I think that the transcript will give the American people a chance to make a determination of the involvement of the Torrijos family and anybody else.

I must rise in response to my good friend from Utah when he said that we do not have enough evidence to stand up in court, but nonetheless we have the circumstantial evidence, and so on and so forth.

Having been a prosecutor for 8½ years, I have heard so many times law enforcement agencies or others say. "Well, I know that even though we can't prove it I know so-and-so is guilty."

I like to think that we have come a lot further than that. And I like to think that we rely on real evidence and not on hearsay, not on will-o'-the-wisp allegations.

I wish to align myself with the statements and the conclusions reached by our distinguished majority leader. They are the same conclusions that I also reached.

I would also hope that at the same time we are not saying that we are dealing with a saint, we are dealing with Saint Omar I here by any means.

But I think that we are being a little bit sanctimonious here in the Senate when some of the people opposing these treaties will stand up and say how concerned they are that we are talking about a dictator who is alleged to have been involved in some kind of drug activity—I do not know whether this means that somehow they have found religion themselves—when I see the positions taken by some of the same Senators during the time of Vietnam, when we spent $150 billion of the American taxpayers' money, 55,000 American lives, and hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese lives in support of various dictators that we embraced wholeheartedly, many of whom were involved more than anybody in Panama in the drug traffic.

Let us not play two sides, of the same coin, Mr. President. I think the distinguished Senator from New York is absolutely right when he says we are losing sight of the main issue in the peripheral matters. It makes no sense to go around and pick and choose our dictators depending upon which particular political bloc in this country happens to support which particular action. I think that our hands are a lot cleaner on this treaty than in a lot of the activities urgently supported by Members of this body in the past.

I yield back whatever time I have remaining.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, a number of Senators asked me for time. I wonder if it might be in order that I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized at 3 o'clock instead of 2 o'clock, at which time I was supposed to be recognized, in order that I might yield first to the distinguished Senator from Indiana (Mr. Bayh), then to the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt), and then to the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) in that order, for 4 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would advise that the Senator from Indiana, under the previous agreement, was to receive 5 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. Very well, 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the request of the Senator from Alabama, then, that the others receive 5 minutes, or 4 minutes?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I want to be recognized for 3, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. You wish to be recognized for 3 minutes?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. Then 3 minutes for Laxalt, 3 for Griffin, and did Senator McClure wish to be recognized also? An additional 3 minutes for Mr. McClure, at the end of which time the Chair recognize me in accordance with the previous order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Indiana (Mr. Bayh).

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the courtesy of the Senator from Alabama, and I doubt very much whether I will use the full 5 minutes. The Senate has heard considerable from me over the last almost continuous 14 hours.

I rise not to get involved in the dispute or in some of the opinions that have been expressed by some of my colleagues, but only to point out, now that we have gone into public session and the public is now aware of what is being said, that I think it is important, perhaps, to briefly lay the foundation of what the Intelligence Committee was commissioned to accomplish, and what we have tried to do over the last 2 days.

Our committee was not asked to make a value judgment on the merits of the treaties, but rather to make available all of the intelligence information relative to drug trafficking and its relationship with the Torrijos family, and if indeed any of that did exist, to what extent not only did it exist, but did it impact on the treaty negotiations?

We attempted, to the best of our ability, to make available the product, either specifically or in a generalized summary from information contained in thousands of documents that have been at the committee's disposal for a period of several weeks.

I think it is important for the public to know that over a period of several days all of this information has been available to every Member of the U.S. Senate who wanted to take advantage of the information and read it. Understandably, Senators have many things to do, and thus not all Members of the Senate were able to take advantage of that opportunity.

I think that the statement which has been released publicly accurately describes the summary of the committee. There is no need for the Senator from Indiana to restate it, and I think as quickly as we possibly can, we should make the transcript of the entire discussion available. We were fulfilling a rather difficult dual responsibility, and I salute the Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater) for his cooperation in this regard. On the one hand, we had the responsibility of making information available, all of the information available to our Senate colleagues, so that they could make an intelligent decision. On the other hand, we had a responsibility not to release information that can endanger lives or damage the collecting mechanism of our intelligence community, so that they will no longer be able to perform that very important function.

The more information we can make available to the American public, so they can have access to what actually has gone on here in the last few days, the better off we are going to be. None of us, and I feel very few of our American constituents, would want us to release information that could endanger lives or cause damage to the future security of our country.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Chair now recognizes the Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt) for 3 minutes.

MR. LAXALT. Mr. President, I would like to make a point or two in connection with the statement of the proponents indicating that these sessions have not been constructive. As far as the Senator from Nevada is concerned, they have been exceedingly constructive. There have been indications, principally from the majority leader, that all the peripheral questions with which we are dealing have now been disposed of. That, in the judgment of this Senator, is not the case. I think the hearings raised far more questions than they answered and that it is evident that the Intelligence Committee, as fine a job as they did, had a narrow focused inquiry. It has been said that the character of General Torrijos and the Panamanian leadership is only a peripheral issue. That, in the judgment of many of us, is not a peripheral issue; it is central to the consideration of this body as to whether we enter into this agreement.

It has been said that they are all the same, the Panamanians are no worse than the rest. I submit to my colleagues that the difference here is that we are not just handing out money; we are handing over a large and vital strategic asset. It is actually critical to the people of this country to know whether or not we are going to enter into an agreement with a government which may be engaging in extensive drug smuggling, or which may be engaged extensively in corrupt government practices. That is basic, it is central to this issue, and as far as this Senator is concerned, we are going to continue this line of inquiry throughout the course of the debates.

I yield whatever remaining time I have to the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would advise that the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) has 3 minutes in his own right, and a minute and a half of the time remaining to the Senator from Nevada.

MR. GRIFFIN. I thank the Chair. I shall not try to evaluate the record of the closed sessions. When the transcript is made available to the public and to the press, it can be evaluated then. Suffice it to say that there is a serious problem.

The Panama connection with respect to narcotics is not a small item. As the indictment made public this morning indicates with respect to the brother of Omar Torrijos, we are not talking about small amounts of marihuana; we are talking about large amounts of heroin. As was publicly revealed, there were 70 kilos of heroin involved in that particular situation, which I think is somewhere in the neighborhood of 150 pounds. There is every reason to believe that these are not isolated instances, but part of a wider pattern.

I think the bottom line here, though, is what do they have to do with the treaties before the Senate? Some point out that they bear on the character of the credibility of the leadership of the other nation with whom we are dealing, and that is true.

Let me make another point: If the drug problem is a serious problem in the United States, and it is certainly related to crime, and we want to do something about it, these treaties, if they are ratified, greatly diminish and reduce the capability of the United States to cope with the illicit drug traffic.

Why do I say that?

Well, we may turn the canal over to Panama in the year 2000, but under these treaties it is 30 months after ratification that we turn police power and customs jurisdiction over to the Republic of Panama—30 months.

At the present time, of course, the United States, as if it were sovereign, has complete control and jurisdiction within the Panama Canal Zone. We not only can arrest people; we can even inspect vessels going through the canal which we believe or suspect are carrying nuclear missiles, contraband, or drugs. Thirty months after we ratify these treaties customs jurisdiction will vest in the Republic of Panama. We will no longer be able to inspect vessels.

Then even more interesting about these treaties is that under the accompanying documents, agreements, and implementation of article III and article IV, we would agree that anyone apprehended by the United States for violation of drug traffic, whether he be a U.S. citizen or a Panamanian, will have to be turned over to the Republic of Panama immediately.

That is very interesting.

Under both of these provisions there is procedure that if a U.S. citizen or a Panamanian is apprehended by the United States and he is charged with murder, rape, robbery, violence, or trafficking in drugs or crimes against the security of Panama—whatever that is—we will be obligated immediately to surrender him and turn that person over to the Republic of Panama.

Those who have confidence in the Republic of Panama, of course, concerning the drug traffic will think that is a fine provision. But in this Senator's mind it would be a great weakening of the capability of the United States to deal with the drug traffic problem.

I admit there are many other considerations whether or not these treaties should be ratified. That is not the only one or the most important one, but it is an important factor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired. The Senator from Idaho (Mr. McClure) is recognized.

Mr. McCLURE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I understand that I am now to be recognized and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) is to be recognized at 3 o'clock; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. McCLURE. I ask that 3 minutes of the time between now and 3 o'clock, which I will not use, be granted to the Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, the entire issue of what was said or was not said or what was revealed or was not revealed in the secret session of the Senate is one thing, but I do not think we should allow a characterization of the sessions of the last several hours of today and yesterday to be characterized as being meaningless. Nor am I much impressed by the eloquence of my good friend from Vermont who said that, because of his experience as a prosecutor, we should not pay attention to something if we could not convict in court.

If my memory serves me correctly, and I was here during nearly all of the debate and discussion over the last 2 days, the Senator from Indiana being pressed on this point said he was satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence, even though the evidence may not be sufficient to convict in a court because in a criminal court it requires satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt.

Are we going to erect in our minds a barrier to the consideration of substantial evidence of corruption in this regime and drug trafficking by this regime simply because it would not be sufficient to carry the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt?

I would say the American people have a right to expect that we are not going to deal with that kind of a regime and wipe out of the record everything that we cannot prove beyond a reasonable doubt, which is what some are suggesting.

I know there are some who said that the proceedings yesterday were boring. I do not know why they should have thought they were boring. They were not even here. I sat here through all of it. I was not bored. Why? Because the evidence that was brought forth I think is credible, is compelling, and is certainly something that the American people are going to be concerned about. It cannot be boring when upon one instance, one proven instance, there were 150 pounds of heroin carried into New York City.

The charge was made that this regime is no more corrupt than the regimes in South Vietnam. I do not recall that South Vietnam was charged with bringing heroin into New York City. That difference, I say, is worthy of consideration by the people of the United States as well as the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Idaho has expired. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. I thank my distinguished colleague.

I regret I was unable to be here when other statements were made concerning the sessions. As one who suggested that we have the closed-door session, it seems to this Senator that certain facts have been made available to the public.

This Senator will say, as I have said before, I never suggested for one moment that somehow the negotiators are somehow influenced by drug trafficking, or anybody else, but I am suggesting that the American people are concerned with whether or not General Torrijos is a man of credibility, a man of integrity.

I will say again, we have analyzed some of our genuine mail. About 48 percent opposed the treaty because of Mr. Torrijos. So he is a factor in these debates. He must be because President Carter never mentioned his name once during the fireside chat.

We must look at the total record.

The Senator from Kansas believes that, based upon what we have heard and cannot reveal, and what was revealed in the sanitized version yesterday on page 15, clearly indicates that Torrijos still has drug traffic. He turned his head as far as government officials were concerned. He helped his brother avoid arrest.

It seems to this Senator, if I were a protreaty Senator—I still have not decided—if I were a protreaty Senator I would be out trying to get all of the information I could to the American people about drug traffic.

I think the hearing was a good exercise. I will be pleased when the transcript is made public so that the American people can judge.

I do not know who would characterize it as a waste of time. Many things we do are a waste of time if one is not interested or if one's mind is made up. For all those who had their minds made up maybe it was a waste of time, whether they were for or against the treaty.

By actual count there ranged between 70 and 24 or 25 Senators on the floor all day yesterday. Today the attendance was about normal for open sessions on the canal treaties, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12. But there is an interest. If the Senator from Kansas is any judge there were some Senators on the floor yesterday, the important ones, who have not yet made up their minds. They are the ones we are addressing. They are the ones being focused upon in these debates. I would hope that they receive information that may be helpful.

As I told the distinguished chairman of the committee (Mr. Bayh) and the distinguished ranking minority member (Mr. Goldwater), if the facts indicate there was no involvement by General Torrijos, the Senator from Kansas will say so, and say so publicly. I think I can be objective in what I heard, what I saw, and what I read in the last 2 days.

I would just conclude by turning to page 15 of the public report, if my time does not expire:

Some sources have provided intelligence which we view as reliable and which we believe suggests that General Torrijos knew about narcotics traffic by government officials—and did not take sufficient action to stop his brother's activities. Intelligence reports also contain other allegations asserting that General Torrijos assisted his brother.

It seems to me that the record is made. The record made in the closed session is even more complete. When it is made public, as it should be, with very little censorship, I trust, then the American people will be in an even better position to judge the pros and cons of this particular debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Moynihan). The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) with the time not to be charged against the 30 minutes reserved for me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Alaska is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague. I just felt that the statements that were made should not go un rebutted. I looked in at the secret session around noontime, when, essentially, most of the membership of the Senate was available to attend. What I saw was Senator Dole, Senator Griffin, and the patient Senator Sarbanes, listening to them drone on. You could not draw flies to this Chamber, and I can assure you if there were something salacious that was going to be revealed, we would all have been here, quite attentive, to listen to it.

I think the long and short of it is that, without revealing what went on in the secret session, I could say that what was said here I read in the newspapers in the last 2 or 3 weeks. There is nothing, really nothing, that came out yesterday of any note or of any value, yesterday and today, that we have not already read about. And most of it, in fact all of it, is unsubstantiated charges, besmirching the character of the head of state of Panama.

It is a good tactic to have a secret session, because you create an aura that something unusual was said, and as a result of that you give credence to these unsubstantiated charges. I think it is most unfortunate, because it detracts from what is really essential in this regard; that is, the use of the Panama Canal by American interests.

I think that when the SALT Treaty comes before us, if we are going to be faced with secret sessions going to the character of Mr. Brezhnev, we are going to be in real trouble trying to get some treaties through this body. That is essentially the same tactic that was employed; that is, let us not talk about the Nation, let us not talk about the broad national interest; let us just pick out some little flaw that we think might sell, from a spectacularized and sensationalized point of view, to the salacious appetite of the American public and concentrate on that as a device of appealing to the negative side of the issue.

I think that is most unfortunate. I think the issue is and still remains, are these treaties the best available to guarantee the future utilization of the Panama Canal by American economic interests? I think that argument has not been addressed one iota in the last 2 days by all of this silliness and this waste of time.

I thank my colleague for yielding to me.

Mr. ALLEN. I am happy to accommodate the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, when I conclude my remarks, I shall offer a motion on behalf of myself and Mr. Laxalt, Mr. Garn, Mr. Hansen, Mr. McClure, Mr. Thurmond, Mr. Griffin, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Lugar, Mr. Tower, Mr. Dole, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. Helms, and Mr. Scott, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty Ex. N (95th Cong., 1st sess.), Calendar No. 2. But I do not present it at this time. I merely state that it is my intention to offer the motion on behalf of myself and the distinguished Senators whose names I have called.

Before getting into the matter of the motion, I do wish to comment on remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) on Monday. I sought on Monday to gain the opportunity to rebut his statement, but the opportunity did not present itself. I have informed the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) that, at this time, I do plan to seek to rebut the remarks that he made.

He took sharp issue with me when I stated that the treaties under consideration do provide that the canal is to be operated on the basis of neutrality and that warships of belligerent and enemy countries would have access to the canal under the treaties before the Senate. I stated that that was not the situation under the present regime. The distinguished Senator from Idaho stated that that was one statement that was so striking that he must reply to it at that time:

It was asserted that by virtue of the neutrality provision in the treaties, we somehow open the canal to warships of other nations, including enemy ships.

I will read from the treaty itself, the Neutrality Treaty, article II.

The Republic of Panama—

And theretofore, it is stated that the United States of America and the Republic of Panama agreed, and I might say that this shows the prospective operation of this Neutrality Treaty, because it speaks of the Republic of Panama—

The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the Canal in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there will be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, concerning the conditions or charges of transit, or for any other reason.

So it is open, under the treaties under consideration, to the peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality in time of peace and in time of war.

If that does not mean that belligerent vessels can transit the canal peacefully, I do not know how we could state it.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho then referred to the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. Senators not familiar with the treaty might assume that that was a treaty, since this seems to be something of a Spanish word, "Pauncefote," might assume that that was a treaty between the United States and Panama. But that is not the case. The distinguished Senator from Idaho, it seems to me, has introduced a new dimension into this discussion, because he resurrects the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty—not the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty that has been denigrated here on the floor so often by the proponents of the proposed treaty, but the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. That was a treaty between the United States and England, of all countries, having to do with the operation of a canal when and if the United States built one. It came about in the year 1901.

The Bunau-Varilla Treaty did not come until 1903.

The distinguished Senator quoted a neutrality provision in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. And when the Senator from Alabama had the temerity to suggest that the regime as to the operation of the canal was changed back in 1914, he was called to task even though as it states here, as shown by the Record in page S1885, that "This agreement"—talking about the protocol of 1914—"This agreement allows certain vessels neutral status"—this is the Senator from Alabama, speaking on February 20:

which was as written into the treaties, but it also requires, as I recall, such shipping to remain in Panamanian waters for 3 months, before transiting the canal, and vice versa. I do not have the document with me at this time. It is called the Protocol of 1914, and I will introduce it into the Record later.

I ask unanimous consent that I may provide, at the conclusion of my remarks, for printing in the Record the protocol to which I have referred.

Mr. ALLEN. I will read from the protocol of October 10, 1914. This was signed on behalf of the United States by Robert Lansing—he was at that time Assistant Secretary of State, later he became Secretary of State—and Eusebio Morales.

That would seem to me, Mr. President, that this name would indicate that Mr. Morales was a Panamanian. We have heard so much talk about the 1903 Treaty not being signed by a Panamanian. I believe Mr. Morales was a Panamanian and he signed this protocol, the effect of which was to provide a method by which belligerent vessels of an enemy nation could be effectively denied access to the canal.

I will read another paragraph from it, the second paragraph; it has only two paragraphs:

That hospitality extended in the waters of the Republic of Panama to a belligerent vessel of war or a vessel belligerent or neutral, whether armed or not, which is employed by a belligerent power as a transport or fleet auxiliary or in any other way for the direct purpose of prosecuting or aiding hostilities, whether by land or sea, shall serve to deprive such vessel of like hospitality in the Panama Canal Zone for a period of three months, and vice versa.

I call attention, Mr. President, to the date of this protocol, October 10, 1914, as World War I was getting started.

The practical effects of this protocol will involve the rights of the United States to exclude belligerents from the canal. As many Senators have heard of it, doubtless, for the first time, I might state that possibly the hearing of it for the first time caused the assertions taking me to task on the subject.

I would like to read from the Record here where Mr. Church says:

Mr. President, there is nothing in the evidence before the Foreign Relations Committee to suggest that any subsequent agreement altered, obviated or repealed the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, nor is there anything in the record to suggest or imply that the United States ever operated the canal except in accordance with the principles of neutrality as set forth in that treaty.

So, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Idaho has introduced into the discussion the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 and he states that nothing has been done to alter, obviate, or repeal the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

So I might just say parenthetically, it looks as if we will not make much progress on this. We are going to also have a treaty with England to do away with that being the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, because in a number of respects it is inconsistent with the provisions of the treaties before us.

But this protocol of 1914, in effect, provides that a belligerent vessel seeking access to the Panama Canal from Panamanian waters would have to remain in Panamanian waters for 3 months before entering the canal.

Well, during that time, it would be there as a sitting duck, a duck in a rain barrel, to be picked off by its enemy nation, and vice versa.

If it were in the Canal Zone waters first, it would then have to remain there for 3 months before going into Panamanian waters.

Bear in mind that the territorial waters of the Canal Zone would extend for 3 miles beyond the shore.

So, Mr. President, to show that that was the method they had of containing enemy vessels, make them wait for 3 months in the Panamanian waters and not have immediate access to the canal, or if they came to the canal first and then went out into Panamanian waters, then they would have to stay 3 months in canal waters and, in any case, they were denied free and open access to the canal.

Now, Mr. President, as World War II comes along, or as it is seen coming, because this added exchange of notes took place on August 25, 1939, there is an exchange of notes between Mr. William Dawson representing the United States and Narcisco Garay representing Panama, and I would assume Mr. Garay was not a Frenchman as has been said of Bunau-Varilla.

This was an agreement entered into in arms-length dealing. Mr. Dawson writes the Panamanian Government:

EXCELLENCY:

My Government assumes that the protocol signed by the Secretary of State and the Minister of Panama on October 10, 1914,¹ dealing with hospitality extended in the waters of the Republic of Panama and of the Canal Zone to belligerent vessels of war or those employed by belligerent powers for the purpose of prosecuting or aiding hostilities is still in force.

This was 25 years later. In 1939, it might have caused some concern as to whether the Panamanians still recognized this method of containing belligerent vessels:

However, it would be appreciated if in view of existing circumstances.

What circumstances? The oncoming World War II which got started, I believe, about a week after these notes were exchanged:

However, it would be appreciated if in view of existing circumstances, the Government of Panama would signify in writing that it shares the view of the United States as to the present force and effect of this protocol.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

WILLIAM DAWSON.

So the Secretary of the Foreign Relations and Communications in Panama replies:

I have the honor to advise Your Excellency in reply to your esteemed note No. 38 of this date that the Government of Panama considers that the protocol signed at Washington on October 10, 1914, by the Minister of Panama in the United States of America, Dr. Eusebio A. Morales, and the Secretary of State of the United States, Robert Lansing, is at present in effect and may be applied by both countries whenever circumstances require.

I call attention also, Mr. President, to the fact that the Panama Canal Treaty wipes out this protocol, this exchange of notes, wipes out everything as between Panama and the United States, leaving only the neutrality provision of the treaties under consideration which, as I have read, is effective in war and in peace.

So, Mr. President, it would seem to the Senator from Alabama that he was fully justified in saying that the treaties before us would allow access to the canal by enemy vessels, whereas the present regime, in depending on the Protocol of 1914, puts a very effective condition and limitation on free access to the canal.

So the Senator from Alabama merely wished to answer, this being the first opportunity he has had to answer the comments made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

Now, Mr. President, getting to the matter of the motion that I will present in a few moments: There are two treaties, as we all know, but for the record I will say that there is a Panama Canal Treaty that provides for the transfer of the canal over to Panama, the conditions under which the canal is to be transferred. This treaty expires with the end of this century.

Then there is the other treaty, which does go into effect at the same time as the first treaty I mentioned but has no real area of operation; because for the remainder of this century, the United States is going to defend the canal. So there is not any great field of operation for it until the next century.

However, it is my contention, and the contention of Senators who have joined me in cosponsoring this motion, that we first should decide whether or not we are going to give the canal away, before we decide how we are going to defend it, starting with the year 2000.

We have under consideration now the Neutrality Treaty, to be followed by the Panama Canal Treaty. This motion seeks to reverse the order. No time would be lost. All the debate has been general. Not a single amendment has been offered to article I of the Neutrality Treaty. All the debate that has been engaged in could apply to both treaties.

Is this the first time an effort has been made to change the order of treaties? I say no. I refer to page 822 of Senate Procedure, where it states:

A motion to lay aside a treaty and take up another is not in order, the motion should be to proceed to the consideration of a particular treaty, which if agreed to would have the effect of displacing the pending or unfinished treaty, but the Senate can have no unfinished executive business.

So we could not just lay it aside. We have to move to proceed to something else, and it still remains on the calendar. It does not kill the other treaty. It just says we are going to consider the Panama Canal Treaty, and we are going to consider whether we give the canal away, before we worry about defending it in the year 2000.

So the present situation puts the cart before the horse. We need to decide first whether we are going to give the canal away.

Mr. President, I make this assessment of the time it is going to take in considering these treaties. I have stated this to the majority leader and the minority leader, and I have stated it to the President of the United States.

I believe we all are concerned about how long it is going to take to complete action on these treaties. After all, amendments are going to be offered. I said on the first day the treaties were before the Senate that several dozen are going to be offered. I hope we will have a vote. My assessment is that if we reverse the order of these treaties, we will save at least a week. We will save at least a week of debate.

How could that be? We have the same treaty. The reason is that the leadership amendment has some 78 sponsors, and the Senator from Alabama is one of those sponsors. If we cannot do anything better—and I think we can—I would support the leadership amendment on the right to come back in after the year 2000. I think that needs to be amended, and I have an amendment to do that. But if the leadership amendment is agreed to, then obviously the proponents of the treaties will say, "Well, that's the only amendment needed. Let's stonewall the rest of the amendments and get through with this."

However, many of us regard these two treaties as two integral parts of a whole. Right now, they are indivisible, as we see it. They are the canal treaties, and we oppose these canal treaties.

Those who oppose the treaties are not going to be very anxious to come to a vote on the Neutrality Treaty. The proponents will claim victory and say, "We have the only amendment we really need adopted. Therefore, let's close the thing out."

That would not take place, I assure Senators. Still, that would be the argument.

The point is, however, that we are not going to reach the leadership amendments any time soon; whereas, if we take up the Panama Canal Treaty first and dispose of it, I would say that the Neutrality Treaty could be wrapped up in possibly a couple of days.

There might be five, six, seven, or eight legitimate amendments trying to strengthen it, trying to strengthen our national security, trying to strengthen our defense position, trying to underscore the conditions under which we might come in, giving us the right to retain troops past the year 2000, if the President deems it is necessary for the defense of the canal. So five, six, or seven amendments are all we need, once we decide the other.

Also, Mr. President, going this route, going the route of considering the Neutrality Treaty first, the leadership is depriving many Senators of the opportunity to vote favorably on the Neutrality Treaty.

I feel that after extensive debate on the Panama Canal Treaty, after efforts to amend the treaty on the floor, after that finally has been agreed to, if it is, then the Neutrality Treaty, already having 78 votes for the leadership amendment, would be approved overwhelmingly. That would show what great Pan American solidarity we have here in the United States. By approving this Neutrality Treaty, by possibly 90 to 10, something of that sort, we could say to Mr. Torrijos, "Let's look at how the Senate has fallen in step here. We have contained these amendments. We have not let them adopt any amendments but the one that you agreed to. So we have great solidarity here, great Pan American feeling."

But we are not going to have that if we insist on acting on the Neutrality Treaty first.

So the effect of this motion. Mr. President, is in no way to defeat the treaties. It is just has a different order of consideration of the treaties.

Let us decide first, if we are going to give the canal away, and let us decide second, how we are going to go about defending it in the year 2000.

I believe we are putting the cart before the horse. I believe this motion would set the amendments aright. I believe that it would result in the final vote on the Neutrality Treaty being an overwhelming vote in favor—provided, of course, the treaty itself is approved. I assume that the leadership would not go to the second treaty if the first treaty is defeated. But if the first treaty is approved, we will see an overwhelming vote in favor of the Neutrality Treaty, after sincere and constructive efforts have been made to make it better for the United States, better from the standpoint of our right to defend the canal.

EUSEBIO A. MORALES.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the public interest will be served, Mr. President, by agreeing to this motion which I now send to the desk and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen), for himself and Mr. Garn, Mr. Laxalt, Mr. Hansen, Mr. McClure, Mr. Thurmond, Mr. Griffin, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Luger, Mr. Tower, Mr. Dole, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. Helms, and Mr. Scott, moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty (Executive N, 1st Session, 95th Congress), Calendar No. 2.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion.

The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, first of all, I would like to reply to the able Senator from Alabama in connection with the argument we had on Monday, in which the able Senator charged that, under the provisions of the pending treaty, enemy ships in time of war would have use of the Panama Canal.

In reply to that allegation, I said that from the moment the United States began operating the canal in 1914 we have maintained a regime of neutrality as it relates to the transit of ships through the canal.

I said, further, that this regime of neutrality was rooted in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901. This afternoon, the able Senator from Alabama said that I had added a new dimension to this debate, by referring for the first time to a treaty which preceded the Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 and which, indeed, was not a treaty between the United States and Panama at all, but one between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. President, this gets us back to the elementals of the case. The Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 incorporates by reference the regime of neutrality to which the United States agreed in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901. It thus is directly relevant to the question before us and can in no way be considered as a new dimension in this debate.

Let me quote from article XVIII of the Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 between the United States and the newly established Republic of Panama.

Article XVIII reads as follows:

The Canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by Section 1 of article three of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

So there is the starting place: 1901, the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, by which the United States committed itself in perpetuity to a regime of neutrality for the operation of the Panama Canal.

The Hay-Pauncefote provisions were incorporated by reference into the Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 in article XVIII thereof.

But the Senator from Alabama alleges that, subsequent to 1903, namely, in 1914, and again in 1939, the United States and Panama entered into a different agreement. He has entered it in the Record and he has interpreted the protocol to mean that it somehow superseded or altered the provisions relating to the regime neutrality in the original treaty of 1903.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama misconstrues the meaning and intent of the protocol of 1914, renewed in 1939. I am sure that he has done so believing his interpretation to be accurate, but the history of the case establishes that the 1914 United States-Panama protocol concerning neutrality has nothing to do with the question of the transit of ships through the canal, whether warships or ships of commerce. The 1914 agreement does not speak to the transit rights of belligerent vessels through the canal nor does it relate to the obligations we assumed under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty or the Bunau-Varilla Treaty. Rather, it deals with the application to Panama and the Canal Zone of the principles of international law which then governed the rights and duties of belligerent nations and neutral nations during wartime.

Mr. President, remember we are speaking of 1914 and 1939. We are speaking of a period that predates the United Nations Charter, a period when the rules relating to neutral nations and belligerent nations were set forth in the Hague Convention of 1907. In that period, belligerent warships could not refuel in ports of a neutral country until 3 months had elapsed from the time of their previous refueling in that country. This was a part of an international convention, relating to the rights of belligerent ships to fuel or refuel in neutral ports. It had nothing whatever to do with the right of transit through the Panama Canal.

The 1914 protocol simply provides that, when the United States and Panama are neutral in a conflict between other nations, the ports of the Panama Canal Zone and Panama shall be treated as ports of the same neutral nation. In other words, Mr. President, this protocol is simply an agreement between Panama and the United States that the rules of international law then applicable to the rights of belligerent nations to use neutral ports would apply in the Canal Zone and in Panama as though both were one neutral nation when both the United States and Panama were neutral in a conflict between other nations.

Here is the controlling provision of the protocol:

That hospitality extended in the waters of the Republic of Panama to a belligerent vessel shall serve to deprive such vessel of like hospitality in the Panama Canal Zone for a period of 3 months, and vice versa.

The true meaning of this protocol is totally different from the interpretation given it by the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

It is true that this protocol will be terminated once the New Panama Treaty takes effect, because the Canal Zone will then cease to exist as a separate jurisdictional entity. Thus, the 1914 protocol which addresses the use of ports in the Panama Canal Zone would have no further application.

All the ports of both Panama and the Canal Zone would then be in the territory of the same nation, thus rendering the protocol moot.

So you see, Mr. President, these two agreements, first entered into in 1914 and reaffirmed in 1939, have nothing whatever to do with the question of transit through the Panama Canal. They in no way conflict with the statements I made on Monday concerning the pledge by the United States in perpetuity to operate the Panama Canal as an open and neutral waterway.

Now, of course, Mr. President, we are all concerned about whether enemy ships, in time of war, should be permitted to use the Panama Canal. In the First and Second World Wars, no enemy vessel ever presented itself for transit through the canal. Our Navy would not let them present themselves. Our Navy had command of the seas, of the access to the canal on both the Pacific and Atlantic sides. Our Navy was in a position to prevent any enemy vessels from approaching the canal. That is how we denied the use of the canal to enemy ships—on the high seas. This was the only practical way of doing it, anyway, since to allow an enemy ship to come within firing distance of the canal would, of course, have jeopardized the canal itself.

So let us put aside these arguments of obfuscation. Or, if they are going to be made, let us at least interpret the agreements correctly. In any case, the agreements, even if interpreted correctly, had precious little to do with our success in two world wars in preventing enemy ships from transiting the canal. There was no paper agreement we relied upon for that purpose; we relied upon the U.S. Navy, and we will again if ever we should engage in another war.

So I would hope that the Senate would not be deflected by arguments of this kind.

Under the new treaties, Panama and the United States, between now and the end of the century, and then, for the indefinite future, would guarantee a continued regime of neutrality for transit through the canal. Nowhere in the new treaties does the United States undertake to guarantee enemy vessels transit to the canal. We would continue to rely, as we have in the past, upon our ability to control access to the canal on the high seas, for this is the only truly effective protection that exists.

Mr. President, before leaving this particular subject, let me say that, in one respect, the new treaties improve our position. The existing 1903 treaty does not commit the Republic of Panama to exclude foreign troops from its territory. Under the existing treaties, if the Government of Panama were to invite foreign troops into Panama, we would have no legal basis to complain, even if those foreign troops were encamped right up against the fences of the Canal Zone.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment at that point?

Mr. CHURCH. I will just as soon as I complete this point.

Mr. ALLEN. I just hope the Senator has heard of the Monroe Doctrine, when he talks about backing Russian and Cuban troops up against the fences.

Mr. CHURCH. I hope the Senator from Alabama is not attempting to portray the Monroe Doctrine as a treaty. The Monroe Doctrine is a unilateral declaration by the United States describing our policy regarding foreign intervention in this hemisphere. It does not affect the point that I was making, that under existing treaty arrangements with Panama, the Panamanian Government does not covenant to keep foreign troops out of its territory, and we would have no legal basis to complain should the Government of Panama invite them in.

But the new treaties improve our position. Under the Panama Canal Treaty we can keep our troops in Panama until the end of this century. Then the Neutrality Treaty comes into play. Article V of the Neutrality Treaty states:

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

So not only is the Senator from Alabama wrong in suggesting that existing treaty arrangements do not commit the United States to maintain a regime of neutrality with respect to the transit of vessels through the canal, but he also fails to recognize that the security of the canal is actually improved by provisions of the new treaties, since Panama guarantees not to permit foreign troops on its soil.

Now, Mr. President, I would like to turn briefly to the motion made by the able Senator from Alabama to reverse the order of consideration of these two treaties.

His argument seems based mainly upon the contention that the Neutrality Treaty does not go into effect until the year 2000, and, therefore, if we first consider its provisions, and then the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty itself we have put the cart before the horse.

First, the Neutrality Treaty goes into effect at the same time as the Panama Canal Treaty. It is not delayed until the year 2000; so the argument made by the Senator from Alabama is without foundation.

Let me read article VIII of the Neutrality Treaty, because that specifically establishes when the Neutrality Treaty becomes effective. Article VIII reads:

The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

So, Mr. President, this is not a case where the Panama Canal Treaty takes effect and then, years later, the Neutrality Treaty takes effect. Rather, the two treaties become effective simultaneously.

The Panama Canal Treaty, it is true, gives the United States primary responsibility for defense of the canal until the year 2000. But this certainly does not relegate the Neutrality Treaty to a secondary role until that time.

First of all, with the exception of article 5 which contains Panama's promise not to permit foreign troops on its territory after the year 2000, the same regime of neutrality will be in effect before 2000 as after, and this regime will be equally applicable to the operation of the canal by the United States or Panama.

Secondly, the Panama Canal Treaty provides that the United States will have the primary responsibility for defense of the canal, but our response to a threat will have to be in accordance with the provisions of the Neutrality Treaty.

Finally, it is just as important for the United States to be able to act against any threat to the canal and to have priority passage through it before the year 2000 as it will be after that date.

Indeed, Mr. President, the committee's two major recommendations for amending these treaties relate to the Neutrality Treaty. I think Senators want to know what decision is going to be made on such crucial matters as the right of American warships to priority passage, that is, our right to go to the head of the line whenever there is either an emergency or a need as we define it; I think Senators will want to know that the United States will have the right, in perpetuity, to intervene to keep the canal open, neutral, safe, and secure.

Let the vital matters be decided first. That is not putting the cart before the horse. It is proceeding in a logical fashion. This is why the Foreign Relations Committee recommended that these treaties be taken up in this order, which is the prerogative of the committee.

I would hope the Senate will uphold the committee's decision that the Neutrality Treaty be considered first. It is logical, sensible, and, I think, in line with the desire of the majority of the Members of the Senate.

I therefore urge the Senate to reject the motion offered by the able Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I would like to answer some comments made by my very distinguished and able colleague, the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church). He is the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee and early next year will become the chairman of that committee. He has great knowledge, great learning, great expertise in the field of foreign relations. I must salute him for that great knowledge.

The distinguished Senator sort of passed off my comments about the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. He said, "Yes, that is true. That is now incorporated in the 1903 treaty." He spoke approvingly of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty incorporated in the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty. I might say I believe that is about the only complimentary comment which has been made here on the floor about the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty. That is, by the proponents of the proposed treaty.

We have heard it denounced by nearly every speaker for the proponents. But lo and behold, here is a good provision that the distinguished Senator from Idaho has referred to. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty has been incorporated in the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty.

Well, that is fine, but that does not kill the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. I have very high authority for the fact that that treaty is still in force and effect.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho on Monday stated it was still in effect.

He said:

Mr. President, there is nothing in the evidence before the Foreign Relations Committee to suggest that any subsequent agreement altered, obviated or repealed the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

So we are still bound by the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, according to the distinguished Senator from Idaho on Monday.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I will be glad to yield. The Senator was kind enough to yield to me. I will be delighted to yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I rise only to say that the Senator is quite correct. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty still remains in effect, and shall remain so even after the entry into force of the new Neutrality Treaty with Panama. The British Government shares our view that the two treaties are entirely consistent. So our action in giving consent to ratification of the Neutrality Treaty or the new Panama Canal Treaty, would in no way vitiate the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. It is still in force and effect, is that right?

Mr. CHURCH. It would remain in force and effect. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain are agreed upon that point.

Mr. ALLEN. In the areas where it is inconsistent with the treaty under consideration, would it not have to be changed or abrogated?

Mr. CHURCH. I might say to the Senator that the two treaties are thought to be consistent. There are some provisions in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty which are no longer relevant to the times, and additional provisions in the Neutrality Treaty not contained in the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. But the Governments of the United States and Great Britain see no conflict between the Hay-Pauncefote and the Neutrality Treaty and, therefore, see no reason to terminate their 1901 agreement.

Mr. ALLEN. In other words, it is still in full force and effect, is that right?

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator is right.

Mr. ALLEN. I would like to read here as regards the neutrality operation of the canal at this time:

The Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague on August 17, 1923, in the case of the S/S Wimbledon, defined "neutrality" of the Panama Canal as meaning the freedom of ships of all nations to transit the Canal without discrimination in time of peace, making specific reference to the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of November 18, 1901, between Great Britain and the United States, in the following terms:—

The distinguished Senator made reference earlier today to the U.N., and I would feel therefore we should call attention to the Permanent Court of International Justice. These are the words of that court:

" * * * while there are various stipulations relating to the "neutralization" of the canal * * * there is no clause guaranteeing the free passage of the canal in time of war as in time of peace without distinction of flag and without reference to the possible belligerency of the United States, nor is there any clause forbidding the United States to erect fortifications commanding the Canal. On the other hand, by the Treaty of November 18, 1903, the Republic of Panama granted to the United States "in perpetuity the use, occupation and control" of a zone of territory for the purposes of the canal, together with the use, occupation and control in perpetuity of any land and waters outside the zone which might be necessary and convenient for the same purposes; and further granted to the United States in such zone and in the auxiliary lands and waters "all the rights, power and authority" * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory * * * to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority." The Treaty further conceded to the United States the right to police the specified lands and waters with its land and naval forces "and to establish fortifications for these purposes." * * * by the Proclamation of May 23, 1917 (of President Wilson), issued after the entrance of the United States into the war, the use of the canal by ships, whether public or private, of any enemy or the allies of an enemy, was forbidden, just as, by Article 380 of the Treaty of Versailles, the Kiel Canal is closed to the vessels of war and of commerce of nations not at peace with Germany."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter addressed to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Helms) dated October 16, 1977, from the Honorable George Jackson Eder of Washington, D.C., be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WASHINGTON D.C.,
October 16, 1977.

Hon. JESSE HELMS,
Russell Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HELMS: According to the papers, the statement of understanding between President Carter and Panamanian dictator Torrijos has "clarified" the meaning of the pending Treaties.

The only thing that is in fact clear is that the Administration is continuing to mislead the American public by using words such as "neutrality" in a way to allay all suspicion, when the very texts of the Treaties themselves—and of the six supplementary documents—define those words in a way that they have never been used before.

The Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague on August 17, 1923, in the case of the S/S Wimbledon, defined "neutrality" of the Panama Canal as meaning the freedom of ships of all nations to transit the Canal without discrimination in time of peace, making specific reference to the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of November 18, 1901, between Great Britain and the United States, in the following terms:—

" * * * while there are various stipulations relating to the 'neutralization' of the canal * * * there is no clause guaranteeing the free passage of the canal in time of war as in time of peace without distinction of flag and without reference to the possible belligerency of the United States, nor is there any clause forbidding the United States to erect fortifications commanding the Canal. On the other hand, by the Treaty of November 18, 1903, the Republic of Panama granted to the United States 'in perpetuity the use, occupation and control' of a zone of territory for the purposes of the canal, together with the use, occupation and control in perpetuity of any land and waters outside the zone which might be necessary and convenient for the same purposes; and further granted to the United States in such zone and in the auxiliary lands and waters 'all the rights, power and authority * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory * * * to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority'. The Treaty further conceded to the United States the right to police the specified lands and waters with its land and naval forces 'and to establish fortifications for these purposes'. * * * by the Proclamation of May 23, 1917 (of President Wilson), issued after the entrance of the United States into the war, the use of the canal by ships, whether public or private, of an enemy or the allies of an enemy, was forbidden, just as, by Article 380 of the Treaty of Versailles, the Kiel Canal is closed to the vessels of war and of commerce of nations not at peace with Germany."

Theodore Roosevelt had emphatically opposed the original draft of the treaty negotiated between Secretary Hay (under McKinley) and Lord Pauncefoot because it provided that the U.S., in the event it built an interoceanic canal, would be prohibited from fortifying it: "I insist that the canal will be absolutely in our control in a military sense." England acquiesced in that interpretation of neutrality in 1901, before the canal was built, and again in 1912, when it was nearing completion: "Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the Canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection."

And President Wilson took full advantage of that interpretation of "neutrality" in World War I, not only by banning all enemy ships, but even proclaiming (November 16, 1917) that no enemy alien should "enter or be found within the Panama Canal Zone." Franklin Roosevelt amplified these prohibitions in World War II, and no nation in the world ever questioned our right to protect, defend and police the Canal and Canal Zone and adjacent waters, and to sink and destroy enemy warships wherever found, or considered that we were violating our guaranty of the Canal's "neutrality".

But under the pending Treaties, as pointed out in my memorandum of September 26th, the warships and auxiliary vessels of all nations must be allowed to transit the Canal freely, without inspection, search or even surveillance, in time of war or of peace, and the policing of the Canal is entrusted exclusively to the Panamanian police and fire departments.

Furthermore, this new meaning of "neutrality" is to be guaranteed by all nations of the world under the accompanying "Protocol", and will be immediately applicable—not just after the year 2000. The provision that the United States "shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal" until the year 2000 is grossly misleading and just another example of hasty—or tricky—draftsmanship. It is meaningless if we cannot police the Canal or interfere with enemy warships and submarines in the Canal or in the "territorial seas" of the Republic of Panama—which are not defined in the Annex "B" that purports to define them.

Thus far, no witness and no commentator in the media has supported his opinion, for or against ratification, by a direct quotation of the terms of the treaties, and there is no evidence that any of them has actually read the two Treaties, the three Annexes, the Protocol, and the two implementary agreements. In other words, they don't know what they are talking about, and I am sure that the same would be true of Averel Harriman, Mrs. Lyndon Johnson and the other notables who are forming a task force to steam-roller the opposition.

One particularly fatuous and famous commentator has said that the whole question is trivial as the Canal no longer has any military importance. If that is true, I'd like to know why the Administration plans to pay Panama over two billion dollars for the privilege of operating and maintaining it—and at least double that amount if inflation proceeds at present rates.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE J. EDER.

[Mr. Gravel assumed the chair.]

Mr. ALLEN. Apparently, the right of the United States to forbid the passage of any of the vessels through the Panama Canal was upheld by the permanent Court of International Justice. So, apparently, under the existing regime, our Nation does have the right to close the Panama Canal to belligerents.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho—he was not talking about it, but with reference to the statements that the 1903 treaty, the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, is weighted in favor of the United States, his argument is that the way belligerent shipping, belligerent vessels can be prevented from going through the canal is to stop them out at sea. How cynical, then, it is to say in the treaties:

The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the canal in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality . . .

We have granted to enemy ships under the treaty the right to transit the canal, but we say that is meaningless because we are going to meet you out at sea. It seems to me to be rather cynical to say we are going to grant them one right and then say we are going to deny them that right by keeping them from getting there.

The distinguished Senator further said that I ought not to be putting erroneous constructions on the protocol of 1914, that I ought not to do that. He cites as a contrary view to the construction that I put on this protocol—he said it does not apply, I believe I am correct, to belligerent vessels seeking to transmit the canal. It did not have anything to do with transiting the canal, he said. Well, what are the vessels there presenting themselves to the canal for if it is not to transit the canal? And does it apply to belligerent vessels or not? This is what it said:

That hospitality extended in the waters of Panama to a belligerent vessel of war or a vessel belligerent or neutral, whether armed or not, which is employed by a belligerent power as a transport—

If it were a transport, it would not be anchoring outside the Panama Canal; I assume it would be seeking to transit the canal—as a transport or fleet auxiliary or in any other way for the direct purpose of prosecuting or aiding hostilities, whether by land or by sea—they are not just anchoring out there. They would be belligerent vessels, I assume. They are seeking entry.

The fact that it is in Panamanian waters, this says:

Shall serve to deprive such vessel of like hospitality in the Panama Canal Zone—

Well, how are they going to get in the Panama Canal Zone if it does not transit the waters of the canal zone?

For a period of 3 months, and vice versa.

So that these belligerent vessels which, for some reason, have just come there, are hovering around the canal, not seeking to transit the canal, the distinguished Senator would have us believe—they have to stay there 3 months before they can move from Panamanian waters to canal waters; or, if they are in canal waters first, and that would be possible on account of the 3-mile limit, then they cannot move to Panamanian waters for 3 months. That does not sound like much neutrality to me if you are going to imprison them there for 3 months.

The distinguished Senator says, no, I must not put that construction on it, because he places another construction on it. That is the only authority he cites, his own construction.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I will not, until I finish my remarks. Then the Senator can make such remarks as he wishes.

That is the authority we have for a different construction. But the Senator sort of chastises me a bit for having the temerity to offer my construction on what this 3-months' delay for belligerent vessels means. That does not sound like much neutrality. That does not sound like giving free and open access to the canal, to me. So I feel that my construction, since I have the letter of the agreement; the wording of the agreement, before me, even though I do not serve on the Foreign Relations Committee, might be just as valid and perhaps a little more so than that of the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Also, the distinguished Senator was sending up some sort of scare signal about Cuba, that Panama could invite in Cuban troops or Russian troops, back them up against the Panama Canal fence, and we could not do anything about it.

I asked him if he had ever heard of the Monroe Doctrine. He said, yes, that is not a treaty. Well, the Monroe Doctrine either means something or it does not mean something. Under the Monroe Doctrine, I do not believe we should look with great favor on the Russians, in the Senator's hypothetical case, either the Russians or the Cubans taking over Panama. I do not believe that would be looked on with a great deal of favor.

Now, the Senator says, well, we ought to consider the Neutrality Treaty first, and he says it goes into effect at the same time as the other treaty. That is true. I made that same statement in my opening remarks, that it goes into effect 6 months after the exchange of notes of ratification, just like the other treaty. But the point that I am making is that the canal is going to be well defended for the rest of this century, even under the Panama Canal Treaty, because we have the primary responsibility of defending it. So we are going to defend it with or without the Neutrality Treaty.

If the Senators are worried, if the Senator is worried about the Neutrality Treaty not being approved, he could, I believe, by unanimous consent, insert a provision in the Panama Canal Treaty that it not become effective until the Neutrality Treaty is approved. The Senator is sitting there with 78 votes on the leadership amendment, so it would seem no doubt but what the Neutrality Treaty would be passed very shortly after the Panama Canal Treaty.

He also talks about the fact that we need to go to the head of line in an emergency. Well, who determines whether it is an emergency or not? The leadership amendment is silent. It is silent on that subject.

What is an emergency to us might just be another day for Panama after it gets control of the canal in the year 2000.

They might say, "We see no emergency, what are you talking about?" "Oh, well, we have got to get through the canal, we have got to go over there to the other ocean, we're in a hurry."

They do not get into such a big hurry down in Panama. They just think, do it tomorrow.

So I do not believe that this leadership amendment is very good at that point.

Also, it has another joker in it, that is, when we talk about intervening down there to protect the neutrality of the canal, the amendment also provides that in our doing this, though, we must not interfere with the internal affairs of Panama. That is in the leadership amendment, taking care of the Panamanian wish, not the wish of the American people.

The American people are not concerned about whether or not we interfere with the internal affairs of Panama. That is written into the leadership amendment. We cannot do anything to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama.

Also, Panama decides if they do not want the U.S. vessels any more to transit the canal. Maybe in the next 22 years Panama will come under the influence of these Cuban soldiers and Russian soldiers that the distinguished Senator from Idaho talks about. Suppose Panama is a satellite of Cuba or a satellite of Russia. Suppose transit of our ships through the canal is denied. We are bound not to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama.

I think going down there and opening up that canal would result in some sort of internal disturbance down there. It would interfere with the internal affairs of Panama.

So it would seem to me, getting back to the motion itself, that it is in the public interest. I believe it is in the interest of shortening the time to be spent on this debate. I believe it is in the interest of logic. I do not know that that is such an impelling force, however, in our deliberations. But in the interest of logic, I feel that we ought to decide first whether we are going to give the canal away or whether we are going to start defending it in the year 2000.

I am mindful that the treaty goes into effect the same time as the other. We have already got the defense of the canal taken care of in the Panama Canal Treaty. We are charged with primary responsibility. We do not need bother about that. But we need worry, I believe, about defending it after all our troops are pulled out.

That is one of the amendments I have, to provide that the President of the United States, if he deems that the military presence of the United States is necessary for the defense of the canal, or for preserving its neutrality, can so certify to the Government of Panama prior to December 31, 1999, and retain our troops there.

But under the leadership amendment, prior to the year 2000 we have to get all of our troops out.

How are we going to defend the canal if we do not have a presence there? We have a presence by landing paratroopers and having amphibious landings. Those are the only two ways I know of to get in there.

So that is what the leadership amendment does and I feel that this leadership amendment is not going to solve anything.

I do feel that we can act, and act hurriedly, on the Neutrality Treaty if the Panama Canal Treaty is approved first and I believe that failure to go first with the Panama Canal Treaty will add a number of days to the consideration of these treaties.

I think another bad reason, as I mentioned at the outset—I do not believe the distinguished Senator from West Virginia was here and I would like to repeat it—that another good reason, and I appeal to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia to consider this reason, is that if the Neutrality Treaty is voted on first there are many of us who regard the two treaties as one package and even though we want the canal to be defended and we want it to be defended in a whole lot stronger fashion, apparently, than the leadership amendment provides for, many of us are going to have to vote against the Neutrality Treaty, because it is part of the overall package, whereas, if the Panama Canal Treaty be first approved, there would be no reason whatsoever why the Neutrality Treaty could not be approved overwhelmingly in short order.

So by going this route, the Senator is depriving many Senators of this Pan-American effort, to show great Pan-American feeling here by an overwhelming vote. It would be much more overwhelming. I do not know if it would be overwhelming anyway. I do not know who is for it and who is not. But it would be much greater, I feel sure it would be greater by quite a few if it is not rushed through first.

Many who would vote for it as a second treaty cannot vote for it as the first treaty. I would like to leave that thought with the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have been pondering that thought for quite some time. I heard the Senator make that statement while I was in my office listening to the debate on the radio.

It is a very appealing argument. It is a very subtle one. It is very persuasive one on the surface. But I will get to that a little later.

The distinguished Senator from Montana is on his feet. He wishes to speak. The distinguished Senator from Maryland has sought two or three times to get the floor.

I would like to yield the floor and let those Senators get the floor in their own right, or retain it and yield it to them by unanimous consent.

I would simply like to be able to move to table the pending motion within a reasonable amount of time without shutting off debate. Several Senators have been waiting.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to make some comments—5 minutes or so—in support of the motion of the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I hope the Senator will withhold a motion to table until those on this side also have had an opportunity.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Very well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after Mr. Melcher and Mr. Sarbanes and Mr. Scott and Mr. Helms have addressed the Senate, I be recognized to make the motion to table the pending motion, with the provision that I be recognized no later than a quarter to 5. That would be 25 minutes from now. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, if the distinguished Senator would include in his unanimous-consent request that each Senator should talk no more than 5 minutes, that would give us equal opportunity.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That would be fine.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would be willing to defer my comment, provided I could be recognized immediately after the vote.

Will the Senator include that in the request?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I will be happy to have the Senator precede me. I should like to make the motion no later than 30 minutes from now, and I would like about 5 minutes before making the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will not object if it is understood that the Senator from North Carolina will be recognized immediately after the vote on the motion to table or the motion by the Senator from Alabama, whichever occurs first.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, let me ask again. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Montana (Mr. Melcher) may be recognized, that the Senator from Maryland (Mr. Sarbanes) may be recognized, that the Senator from Virginia (Mr. Scott) may be recognized, and that I then be recognized; that it also be understood that I be recognized no later than 15 minutes before 5 p.m. today; that immediately upon the disposition of the motion by Mr. Allen, whether by a tabling motion or not, the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Helms) be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) proposes to reverse the consideration by the Senate of the two treaties. He proposes to take up the first treaty first. I believe he is correct in his motion. I believe his motion should be adopted.

Article V of the Neutrality Treaty, or the second treaty, has only one sentence:

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

That is the one sentence of article V of this Neutrality Treaty, and the Panama Canal Treaty referred to therein is the first treaty.

This treaty, the Neutrality Treaty, assumes the ratification of the first treaty. Without the first treaty, this neutrality treaty makes no sense. Without the first treaty, this treaty does not stand alone. This procedure of taking up the second treaty, the so-called Neutrality Treaty, simply defies logic, defies the intelligence of the Senate as well as the intelligence of the American public.

If this treaty should be approved before the first treaty, it will serve as a signal that the Senate must intend that the basic treaty will be approved. I believe it is wrong and without logic to consider these treaties in this order.

For that reason, Mr. President, I hope that Senator Allen's motion to reverse the consideration will be agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I wish to address two points.

First, as to the question of the interpretation of the protocol of 1914, as reaffirmed in 1939, I point out that the view presented by the able Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) is not just his personal view. It is the view that the two governments adhered to and the view that was in fact applied by the governments.

It is very important in this debate to agree at least on the underlying basis of the debate, and the interpretation that was placed on this protocol by the able Senator from Alabama was not the interpretation placed upon it by the parties to the protocol.

What the protocol was intended to deal with was the neutrality law as it applied in 1914 under the Hague Convention. That law said that belligerent warships could not renew their fuel supply in the ports of the same neutral country until 3 months had elapsed from the last refueling. The protocol was intended to deal with that question and not the question of transiting through the canal.

What we did by that protocol was, in effect, to make the ports of the Canal Zone and the ports of Panama the ports of one neutral country, so that a belligerent ship could only stop once every 3 months for refueling purposes and could not come to a port in Panama and then in less than 3 months come back to a port in the Canal Zone.

That is what the protocol did, that is what the two parties to the protocol understood it did, and that is how they applied it—then and again in 1939, during the subsequent neutrality period.

It is very important that what the protocol meant be fully understood. I submit to the Senate that the interpretation put forth by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) with respect to these agreements between the United States and Panama—and note that agreements between our two countries were needed to cover the situation—is the correct interpretation.

Second, I should like to address the question of the motion that is pending before us and the comments of the distinguished Senator from Montana, that we should take up the first treaty first and the second treaty second.

There is no first or second treaty. There are two treaties before the Senate which have been negotiated. There is the Permanent Neutrality Treaty, and there is the Panama Canal Treaty. Without one treaty, the other does not really make sense. The two treaties have to be seen together, as a package.

The distinguished Senator from Montana says that if you do not act on the first one, the other one does not make sense. The same thing applies in reverse. Both treaties are essential to one another. Neither treaty stands alone.

The Panama Canal Treaty, by its own terms, will terminate on December 31, 1999. In judging that treaty, it is essential to know—since that treaty, by its own terms, is to end at the close of the century—what will follow. What will follow is governed by the terms of the permanent Neutrality Treaty. Therefore, in logic, in reason, and in terms of importance—it seems to me eminently clear that the treaty to which the Senate should first address itself is the permanent Neutrality Treaty. That is the order in which the committee made the judgment they should be considered. That is the order in which they are now pending before us on the floor of the Senate.

I think that the motion of the distinguished Senator from Alabama should be defeated and that the Senate should proceed with its business in the manner in which we are now proceeding, which I submit is orderly, logical, and, above all, takes the most important things first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. Scott).

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not address the merits of either treaty at this time, but do rise to support the motion of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, that the order of consideration of the treaties as recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations be reversed.

The letter of transmittal of these treaties by the Secretary of State to the President is that first is the Panama Canal Treaty and second the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal. The same order is in the letter of transmittal by the President to the Senate, that we first consider the Panama Canal Treaty.

I believe that just logic and commonsense requires that we consider them in the order that has been recommended to us by the Secretary of State and the President. I do not know the basis for the Foreign Relations Committee reversing that order, but there must be some reason for it. There may be some type of advantage that they might consider that would be gained by reversing it. Certainly, in my judgment ratification of the neutrality treaty is no basis for ratification of the canal treaty. It just appears that we are reversing things. It would appear that first we should decide whether or not we are going to give away this American canal. As long as we have ownership and control of the canal, then there is no reason for us to enter into a treaty of neutrality and the treaty itself, when you look at it, the neutrality treaty, article V, says after the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory. Within its national territory, of course, should the canal treaty be ratified, would include the Canal Zone. At the present time, it does not include the Canal Zone since that is not the territory of the Republic of Panama.

It seems to me that, first, we ought to decide whether or not there will be a transfer of title and control of the Canal Zone before we consider this question of neutrality. It just is not logical to consider it any other way. I have studied the matter and I see no basis at all. We could go through it and there are a number of features in here. It starts out in article I, "The Republic of Panama declares that the canal is an international transit waterway."

What right does the Republic of Panama have to declare what shall happen to the canal when the canal is the property of the United States? It is only after the other treaty is ratified and after we return the property to Panama that this treaty actually is logical to be considered at all.

I would hope that the position of the distinguished Senator from Alabama will prevail. I understand that our distinguished majority leader intends to move to table and I would hope that the motion to table would be defeated so that the Senate can then express its will on the merits of considering the order of considering the two treaties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under a previous order, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished and very able and learned Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) has moved to proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty. He has stated that if the Senate considers first, as it is presently on course of doing, the Neutrality Treaty, many Senators would be deprived of the opportunity to vote for the Neutrality Treaty; whereas, otherwise they might vote for it, if, indeed, the Senate acted first on the Panama Canal Treaty and gave its approval to the ratification of that treaty.

That coin has two sides. There are many Senators who would not vote for the Panama Canal Treaty and who will not vote for the Canal Treaty, and I am one of them, until first we can settle the questions which are involved in the amendments that have been offered by the joint leadership and have been cosponsored by 76 other Senators.

So, that is a two-way street. It is a very appealing argument the distinguished Senator from Alabama has made and it almost persuades me when he leaves me to feel that if we go ahead and vote on the Panama Canal Treaty, first, that we can just brush off the Neutrality Treaty within a matter of 1 or 2 days and 90 or more Senators may vote to support that treaty. But I am not quite persuaded. As I say, there are those of us who have very serious questions that we want answered with respect to the Neutrality Treaty before we vote on the Panama Canal Treaty.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama has said that we have the cart before the horse. The distinguished Senator from Maryland said it very accurately when he said there is no first treaty, no second treaty, we have two treaties here that we are considering and they are both part of one and the same debate really, and one and the same overall issue and subject.

But the cart is not before the horse, Mr. President. The Foreign Relations Committee reported first on the Executive Calendar a neutrality treaty and then reported the Panama Canal Treaty. To make the argument that because the President in submitting these two treaties to the U.S. Senate for its consideration submitted first the Panama Canal Treaty and then second the Neutrality Treaty, to argue that the Senate itself ought to follow the President in its sequence of reporting these treaties to the Senate, the Foreign Relations Committee, in other words, should have followed that sequence, is to denigrate the role of the Senate. The Foreign Relations Committee was under no obligation to report first on the Executive Calendar the Panama Canal Treaty. As a matter of fact, it was under no obligation to report both of them or either of them. But the committee quite appropriately and wisely, in my judgment, reported first for the Executive Calendar the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

Now, I personally want to know, before I vote for the Panama Canal Treaty, which relinquishes control by the United States as of December 31, 1999, of the Canal Zone, where we stand the next day. I want to know where we stand on January 1 in the year 2000. What will be our rights in times of need or emergency with respect to our war vessels? What will be our recognized rights in respect of guaranteeing the neutrality of access to and out of the canal on January 1, of the year 2000? I want to know that first, before I relinquish control, on December 31, 1999, of the canal.

That was the logic by which the Foreign Relations Committee, in its wisdom, reported to the Executive Calendar the treaty that is now being debated before the Senate.

So the cart is not before the horse. The horse is before the cart; and I maintain that is where the horse ought to be. The horse ought to be before the cart, and let us leave the horse before the cart.

Mr. President, I—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Anticipating that the Senator is going to make a motion to table, will the Senator yield me 3 minutes that I might answer him, before he does so?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator right now.

Mr. ALLEN. Three minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator right now.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for yielding to me to answer some of his remarks.

The distinguished Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd), the able and distinguished majority leader, who, of course, is the ablest parliamentary strategist and technician in the Senate, or possibly that has ever served in the Senate, knows quite well that if he is disturbed about the question of the Neutrality Treaty being considered after the Panama Canal Treaty, and he wants to know what is going to be in it, he knows quite well that he could easily attach an amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty stating that it would not become effective until the Neutrality Treaty has been agreed to, and possibly he would get unanimous consent to do that.

Furthermore, standing there with 78 committee votes on his amendment, there would be no danger whatsoever that the Neutrality Treaty will not pass. After all, we have 22 years to pass the Neutrality Treaty, so I do not believe we are going to get caught up in any rush of time.

I would like to make this appeal to Senators: I feel that possibly some 65 or so Senators are committed to vote for these treaties. I hope that commitment extends only to final passage of the treaties—if I said amendments a moment ago, I meant treaties. I hope that commitment extends only to the final vote on the treaties, and that Senators, during the course of this debate, which is going to last 4, 5, 6, 7, or 8 weeks, will consider with an open mind constructive amendments that will be of benefit to the people of the United States, and that will further protect our national interests. I hope that Senators who are so committed—and the Senator from Alabama is not one of those, as might be imagined—will draw back unto themselves a little bit of independence here.

You will not be violating any pledge to vote for these treaties in changing the order, so that we can have a systematic and logical time and order of consideration of these treaties. Do not feel that because you are committed to vote for the treaties, you have got to vote with the leadership every step of the way, because you are going to find yourselves, a little later on, voting on constructive amendments that the leadership is going to tell you are not necessary to be passed.

So let us use a little bit of independence, I will say to the Members of the Senate, and vote your convictions on these matters as they come up, and still keep the commitment that I know many of you have to the President and to the leadership to vote final approval of the treaties.

This motion is sound. It does bring up the proper treaty for consideration first. I say again, it is my assessment, it is not final in any sense of the word, but it is my assessment of the situation that we will cut at least a week off the total time necessary to consider both treaties if we will reverse the order of consideration of the treaties.

I express my appreciation to the distinguished majority leader, who is always courteous and leans over backwards to accommodate Senators who disagree with him.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator agree to a time limitation on these two treaties if I will agree to reverse the order?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir, but speaking for myself—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I said no, sir, but speaking for myself and myself only, I would be willing to agree to a time limitation on the Neutrality Treaty, such time limitation to start on final action on the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. SCOTT. I would object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have not propounded such a request, but I wanted to see if the distinguished Senator from Alabama would be willing to enter into a time agreement encompassing both treaties—

Mr. ALLEN. I would on the Neutrality Treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. In the event that we would agree to his motion.

I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I shall not take very long. It is very interesting to see the two most distinguished parliamentarians in the Senate bowing and tipping their crowns to each other in this fashion on the Senate floor. As the Senator from Tennessee, I will say that the best advice I can give myself would be to stay in my place, because otherwise I might get hurt.

But, Mr. President, I feel some obligation to rise in opposition to the motion of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, because I feel some responsibility—not total responsibility, of course, but some responsibility—for the configuration in which these treaties were reported by the Foreign Relations Committee.

I am a member of that committee, and I advised my colleagues on the Foreign Relations Committee that I had a big problem with these treaties; that I had searched my conscience, as the Senator from Alabama suggested that we should; and that I had to do something to make them consistent with the interests of the United States. To be specific, that I had to propose certain amendments to remove certain ambiguities in a way that would require concurrence of the Panamanian Government, not just General Torrijos.

While I have never asked the members of the Foreign Relations Committee to acknowledge to me that this situation may have been one of the reasons why they chose to report the treaties in this order, I rather suspect it may have been. Then, as today, I could not vote for these treaties if I were not assured in advance that the Neutrality Treaty was going to be improved, if the defects and ambiguities were not taken care of by the amendments now at the desk of every Senator, cosponsored by 78 Senators.

The Senator from Tennessee thus faces a real dilemma. That is, if we were to reverse the order of these treaties and vote on the Neutrality Treaty first, as I have stated up and down the length and breadth of my State of Tennessee, I could not vote for the treaties.

It is only if we pass perfecting amendments to the Neutrality Treaty that I could say, in good conscience, as I have said earlier, that the national security interests of this country are fully protected.

I would urge, Mr. President, that we preserve the order of precedence in which the treaties were reported by the Foreign Relations Committee. I think it is the logical way to approach this problem. It gives the Members of the Senate the maximum opportunity to express their will and judgment on the future of the canal and the American interests in it after the year 2000. I think it gives us the maximum opportunity to provide that additional improvement to the treaties that only the Senate can bring to bear.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama said, if I understood him correctly, that we should search our conscience. I remember a city councilman in my hometown in Tennessee who was running for reelection once. He campaigned on television and he said:

Now, tomorrow is election day and I want you to search your conscience. If your conscience says to vote for T. S. Walker, vote for T. S. Walker, and if it says don't, you argue with your conscience.

[Laughter.]

All I want to say in conclusion, Mr. President, is I do not know which side of the issue any particular one of my colleagues may be on right now, and I am not going to argue the merits of the treaty. All I am going to say is when you search your conscience, you should come to the conclusion that we need to amend the Neutrality Treaty before we dare proceed with the question of what happens to the canal on a permanent basis. I very much hope the majority leader will move to table this motion, and I will support him enthusiastically.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

The Neutrality Treaty raises questions many Senators want to have answered before we proceed to the Panama Canal Treaty. The real controversy, of course, is on the legality of the treaty. Unless the Senate can be satisfied with these amendments, unless we can have assurances that the Neutrality Treaty will provide, as amended by these leadership amendments, unless we can nail down the important points concerning our rights to take action to protect the canal, then it does not make sense to consider the Panama Canal Treaty.

Therefore, it is with reluctance, Mr. President, that I now move to table the motion made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to table and hope that Senators will support my motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Delaware (Mr. Biden) and the Senator from Colorado (Mr. Haskell) are necessarily absent.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch) is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 30, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Bumpers). The Senate is not in order. Senators will please take their seats or retire to the cloak-room. The Senate will suspend until we have order.

Will Senators please take their seats or retire? The Senate is still not in order.

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. Robert C. Byrd addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from North Carolina is to be recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for his courtesy in yielding.

Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, there will be no more rollcall votes this evening.

May I ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina whether or not he intends to speak this evening or whether he intends to speak tomorrow?

I understand that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Brooke) wishes to speak this evening.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, in response to my friend from West Virginia, it is my intention to speak, but I will yield to the able Senator from Massachusetts for whatever time he may desire and I shall follow him.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HEINZ. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HELMS. Yes.

Mr. HEINZ. I thank my good friend from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bill Ranch of my staff be granted privilege of the floor during consideration of the Panama Canal treaties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I have a similar request for Lee Verstandig and Ed Hawley of my staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BROOKE. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. HELMS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will please withhold until we have order in the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from North Carolina for yielding.

Mr. President, the Senate's ultimate decision on the Panama Canal treaties will have a significant impact both upon our self-image as a nation and upon the perceptions of others regarding our role in the world. It is our solemn obligation to make our debate on the ratification issue a thorough and deliberate effort. The interest of the American people would be ill served by a "rush to judgment." While the impatient would have us believe that time is somehow of the essence, I have found no evidence that such is the case. Rather, I believe the case is compelling for a complete and thorough airing of every aspect of the matter that is before us. On this issue, the "wheels of the Senate should grind slowly and exceedingly fine."

I raise this matter because I recall that in 1972 we handled another issue of great importance in a rather impetuous manner. In retrospect, the conclusion seems inescapable that we gave far too little attention to the ambiguities of the SALT I agreements and their consequences. If we had not done so, we could have perhaps avoided many of the developments that make passage of a SALT II agreement problematical at best. We should not repeat our error of undue haste as we consider the Panama Canal treaties.

Mr. President, we have all experienced a great deal of soul searching and agonizing over these treaties and their implications. A great deal of interest has been shown by the American people in the matter and they have communicated that interest to us.

There can be no doubt that it is our responsibility to examine seriously the views of those we represent. This does not mean that we simply determine that 51 percent of those writing oppose ratification and, hence, determine our vote. That is not expected of us and, indeed, would insult those who had sufficient confidence to elect us to office. What it does mean is that we must thoroughly explore their concerns, determine the weight they should be given, and then choose what is the proper course of action that will best serve the interests of our country and its people. And that is the key, for it is not the interests or pride of Panama, or the satisfaction of one ideological need or another that are of importance on this matter. This is one of those occasions in the Senate when the issue compels us to rise above parochial concerns, for what we are talking about here are matters of the highest national importance with far-reaching, if as yet unforeseen consequences for our country.

Mr. President, we all know that the treaties we will finally vote upon will not be the same as those originally sent to the Senate by the President. It is an open secret that language changes will be made to guarantee the right of the United States to take action, unilaterally if necessary, to defend our access to the canal and to provide for priority passage of our naval vessels through the canal when we determine that an emergency exists requiring such an action. I have cosponsored the amendments of relevance to these issues. If the treaties did not contain them, I would be unable even to consider voting in favor of ratification. And, I emphasize consider, for there are still too many loose ends to permit me, at this time, to indicate my final decision. Let me illustrate why this is the case.

In recent weeks, controversy has arisen regarding the explicit or implicit financial aspects of the treaties. Some have dismissed concern over financial issues as just an obstructionist tactic of those committed to opposing ratification. Such a characterization is both unfair and indicative of an attitude of careless disregard of the right of the American people to understand exactly what this country is being asked to undertake.

Personally, I am still troubled by the financial aspect for several reasons. First, it is apparent that the treaties and the process of their negotiation have created a high level of expectation among Panamanian officials as to the anticipated monetary windfall for Panama over the 22-year period until the canal is turned over. One Panamanian spokesman has stated his expectation that Panama would receive over $2.2 billion during that period. Such expectations, if largely unfulfilled, as they are likely to be, could set the stage for renewed agitation for a Panamanian takeover of the canal before the year 2000. Indeed, it is not inconceivable that passage of the treaties, with gross ambiguities regarding likely financial outcomes, could lead to an exacerbation of tensions rather than a lessening of the same in a relatively short period of time.

Excessive expectations have also been engendered by the administration's commitment to Panama to put together an aid package that could initially total $345 million in loans and credits. While the informal statement to this effect is not binding in a legal sense, I have no doubt that the Panamanians fully expect to receive such aid. With others I believe there should be no linkage, explicit or implicit, between the aid question and the treaties.

Indeed, I think the Senate, in the form of an understanding, should make clear that nothing in the treaties, or in the negotiations of which they were a result, should be construed as in any way committing the United States to provide economic or military assistance to Panama. The aid issue is one to be examined completely independent of our consideration of the treaties. I am, therefore, offering amendments to that effect today. We should leave no room for misperceptions.

There is also a great deal of uncertainty about the financial provisions of the treaties themselves. For instance, the treaty provides that Panama is to receive from canal revenues a payment for services to be provided. During the first 3 years, the payment is to be $10 million annually. Every 3 years the cost of the services are to be re-examined and the payments are to be adjusted up or down to reflect actual costs. The uncertainty arises regarding how possible surpluses over actual costs of services are to be handled in the first 3 year period. Theoretically, the actual cost of the services for each of the 3 years could be $5 million. At the end of the period this would leave a total of $15 million excess over cost. Would that excess be applied to the next 3 year period and correspondingly reduce the rate of yearly payment? Or, would it be returned to the commission? Or, would it be a disguised subsidy to the Panamanian Government? The administration to date has not been able or willing to indicate which would be the case. And, should anyone conclude that concern on this issue is merely nitpicking, let me suggest that it is situations such as this that are tailor-made for corruption and graft. And our secret sessions yesterday and today provide ample evidence that corruption is certainly possible in Panama.

As another example, one can point to the unresolved issue of whether or not the annual interest payment to the U.S. Treasury from canal revenues on the U.S. investment in the canal will be discontinued. This payment is approximately $20 million per year. Its forfeiture would naturally decrease U.S. revenues. It is my understanding that the administration intends to recommend that the payment be discontinued. Its desire to do so raises a question in my mind as to the capacity of the canal to generate sufficient revenues to cover all the anticipated costs. It appears the administration is seeking to implement the self-fulfillment of its projections of canal financial viability by extracting an invisible subsidy from the Treasury.

A third example relates to the borrowing authority presently given the Panama Canal Company. The PCC has the authority to borrow up to $40 million to cover deficits in operations.

Will the administration recommend that this authority be continued for the commission at the same level or at an increased level? There has been some talk of doubling the borrowing authority. Again, this approach would indicate to me administration uneasiness about the financial self-sufficiency of the canal under the provisions contained within the treaties.

An important aspect of the whole issue of canal revenues is the apparent obligation the United States would assume to make up deficits should there be inadequate revenues. Under the treaties, Panama is guaranteed that the canal will be turned over to it in the year 2000 free of liens or obligations. Therefore, if revenues between now and the year 2000 are insufficient, any debts incurred by the canal commission left unpaid apparently will have to be absorbed by the United States.

In this regard, I also must admit to a great deal of concern over the administration's attempt to convince the American people that they would not be required to foot the bill for payments to Panama. This is true only in a very narrow technical sense. The payments to Panama would come off the top of canal revenues and hence the bookkeeping entry would show a transaction between the commission and Panama. Yet, any deficits that arise, which would likely be the result of greatly increased payments to Panama, would have to be borne by the American taxpayer in one way or another. Therefore, it is somewhat disingenuous for the administration to argue that there is no possibility that the taxpayers would, in fact, be required to meet part of the cost of the payments to Panama up to the year 2000.

There are many other aspects of the financial arrangements that remain obscure and ill-defined at present. However, I will not discuss them here. I do wish to emphasize, however, that the most troubling aspect in the financial area is the possibility, indeed, in the minds of many, the likelihood that canal revenues will be insufficient to cover the payments to Panama, the operating and capital costs of the canal and payments due the United States. Thus, it seems clear to me that the United States, if these treaties are ratified, would assume actual and contingent financial obligations of a significant magnitude. The administration has sought to downplay this aspect of the matter. It is the duty of the Senate to make sure that the American people are fully aware of all the financial implications of the treaties.

Having pointed out the gaps that exist in our knowledge about the financial aspects of the treaties, I nevertheless acknowledge that exact predictions of future developments in this area are difficult if not impossible to make. Treaty proponents seek to exude an aura of confidence that toll increases will be sufficient to cover all anticipated costs without engendering the self-defeating effect of forcing shippers to use alternative routes. This strikes me as a bit of whistling in the dark to buck up one's courage.

Opponents of the treaties, on the other hand, predict direly that the deficits will be great, especially after 1984, and that the American people will be forced to foot the bill.

Given the track record of economic projections over the past decade, it is difficult to have a high degree of confidence in the estimates pro or con on this issue. And, I certainly do not expect anyone to state specifically what will actually be required of the United States to meet possible deficits. But, I am convinced that it is the responsibility of the Senate and the administration to point out the range of appropriation to point out the range to meet possible deficits. Indeed, implementing legislation should clearly spell out the procedure by which the decision will be made to request appropriations and the manner by which any moneys thus provided will be paid back. It would be intolerable for the United States to assume obligations without being fully aware of if and when it could expect repayment.

I believe that this brief review of yet-to-be-finalized aspects of the treaties clearly indicates that the Senate is not yet in a position to decide on the ratification question. Indeed, it is clear to me that we should not do so until we have in hand the implementing legislation to be proposed by the administration and have had a chance to examine it in detail. Even our own Congressional Budget Office has stated that:

* * * because the implementing legislation has not been submitted, a complete estimate of the budget impact of the Treaties is impracticable at this time.

I find it difficult to understand why the administration has been unable to provide us with this legislation. It is my understanding that it promised to do so early last fall. And rightly or wrongly, the administration's failure leads many to presume that it is holding back information that is important to our decision. I hope that the leadership will make clear to the administration that the vote on ratification will not occur until the Senate has had the opportunity to review the implementing legislation. It would be a mockery of the process of advice and consent to vote on the treaties, only to find subsequently that we are asked to undertake obligations we had not fully been aware of during our debate.

Mr. President, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, it makes no sense to me for the Senate "to rush to judgment" on this matter. During the next few days, I hope the leadership will explain why there seems to be a compulsion to do so. I certainly will not be prepared to agree to putting the matter of ratification to a vote until all pertinent information, including the implementing legislation, is put before the Senate. Only in this way can we be assured that our final decision will be made in a way that both educates the public as to why it is being taken and eliminates the debilitating ambiguities that threaten any effort to find a satisfactory solution to the vexing question of the future of the Panama Canal.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKE. Yes; I am very pleased to yield.

Mr. DOLE. Let me say to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts he has raised some of the concerns that many of us have in this body, whether we support or oppose or are undecided about the treaties, and that is the economic impact they will have and, second, in the end of his speech is a very important point that I think has not been stressed, and that is the fact that we do not have the implementing legislation yet.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts is absolutely right. We should not be asked to ratify or approve the treaties until we have that implementing legislation, to see how much it is going to cost.

I would hope with the Senator, in effect, serving notice on all of us, we better just take our time and let the administration get it up to us. In other words, they either have to speed it up or have to take more time.

But the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, Senator Stennis, has said this will cost the American taxpayer some money. It is not an accurate statement to say in a fireside chat it does not cost the taxpayer one dime.

The Senator correctly pointed out the increased tolls will add up to $2.26 billion. In addition, there are other payments.

And I think the Senator from Massachusetts certainly made the record clear and raised a number of good questions with reference to the economic benefits.

We want to help the people of Panama. That is not the problem. But I think, as the Senator suggests, we want to make certain we know what it is going to cost the American taxpayers.

I find the taxpayers in the State of Kansas, and I am sure it is certainly true in the State of Massachusetts, feel they are pretty well taxed already.

This may not add a great deal to that burden, but it is certainly significant, and I commend the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROOKE. I thank my distinguished colleague from Kansas, and he is absolutely correct. I certainly did intend to serve notice that I for one will do everything possible to forestall the vote on ratification of these treaties until such time as the American people and the U.S. Senate, which, is called upon to vote on a ratification, have full knowledge of all the financial implications of the treaties, and have reviewed the implementing legislation in detail. I deem this to be essential prior to the votes on ratification.

I cannot for a moment understand why the administration has failed consistently since last fall to send the implementing legislation to the Senate for its review.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield a second, I think they will understand when they hear about the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts this afternoon. They will understand when they know there are not enough votes for ratification. I do not say it critically. I just say it as a matter of fact. But once they know the votes are not there, we will see the movement that the Senator has been requesting.

Mr. BROOKE. I think the Senator from Kansas is well aware that I feel very strongly on this matter, as I have tried to indicate in my speech to the Senate today. Even more so I feel deeply that we should not divide this country on this issue. It is one of importance and of relevance, to be sure. And I think we ought to know all of the facts, every detail, concerning what the treaties are, what they are not, what the treaties involve, what they do not involve, and how much it is going to cost the American people if they are ratified.

We cannot "buy a pig in the poke." We ought to know exactly what we are talking about. And these statements which have been thrown out, as the Senator from Kansas has said, that they will not cost the American people a penny, are obviously not true. It will cost the American people. The question is, How much will it cost the American people and is the cost a necessary one to bear because of our natural interests?

Mr. DOLE. How much.

Mr. BROOKE. They should know that.

Mr. DOLE. Not only how much but how long.

Mr. BROOKE. How long is it going to cost us?

Mr. DOLE. Right.

Mr. BROOKE. I think we ought to know that before we get into it.

Why this urgency I cannot say. I just do not know why some feel the need to "rush to judgment."

I think the administration really wanted these treaties ratified last fall when they were first presented to us, and I think they found out we did not want to ratify them then. Many of us gave advice to the President, that the treaties could not be passed at that time. The Senate needed and still needs time to examine the matter in great detail. We needed time for the American people to understand what the treaties are all about; and now more and more people are becoming aware, but we still have not given them sufficient information upon which to make a judgment call.

Such information must include not only the financial arrangements that are involved and how long they are going to be in effect, but also the exact nature of the implementing legislation to be proposed by the administration.

So I thank the Senator from Kansas for his comments. I have known of his sensitivity to this question. And I thank him for the words he said in support of this position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I, too, want to commend the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

His remarks, which he has just completed, represent to me one of the more sensible discourses in this entire debate and, needless to say, I am delighted to hear the position that he has taken. It is a responsible position. It is certainly a position that, in the judgment of the Senator from North Carolina, the vast majority of the American people share with him, and the points he has raised are the very same points which the Senator from North Carolina raised in hearings of the Armed Services Committee.

The American people deserve the right to know specifically and precisely what this is costing them, and once they know that, this Senator is persuaded that the people will react very strongly if, as, and when this Senate should make the mistake of ratifying the treaties.

But be that as it may, the Senator from North Carolina in a moment is going to discuss the moral aspects. He is going to discuss the corruption in the regime in Panama and, as the Senator from Massachusetts indicated, the people of the United States deserve to know about this so that they can understand without any peradventure just what kind of regime it is, just who it is to whom we are proposing to turn over the Panama Canal.

So I commend the Senator for wanting to get to the bottom and reach the undeniable facts in this case, and I appreciate his comments.

Mr. BROOKE. I thank my distinguished colleague from North Carolina. As he knows, I serve on the Appropriations Committee. I am privileged to serve on that committee. Obviously, we would be faced with appropriations problems which have not even been suggested as yet, and I would hope that the administration would heed our counsel; that it would make known to us explicitly and in detail what the financial arrangements would be and send to us the implementing legislation that is necessary to obtain this information. I do not know, but I think if it fails to do so it will have made a grievous error so far as the Panama Canal Treaties are concerned and will not be living up to its responsibilities—not only to the U.S. Senate but to the country as a whole.

I thank my colleague.

Mr. HELMS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROOKE. Yes; if I have time.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, just to establish the facts, I do have the floor, do I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am glad to yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator so much.

As usual, Senator Brooke speaks sincerely, eloquently, and always with deep perception. I am his friend as well as his colleague, and I have listened very carefully.

Certainly everything must be laid on the table. I think the closed-door sessions demonstrated that and the fact that the Members charged with sanitizing the transcript are now instructed, as if they needed instructions, to lean over backwards on the greatest public disclosure.

I would also suggest to the Senator that the record before the Foreign Relations Committee is very replete with exactly what he is asking for, other than the implementing legislation which will and should come up here—no question—unless there is a good reason which I have not heard.

Mr. BROOKE. The Senator said it will come up?

Mr. JAVITS. I believe so.

As I say, unless there is some good reason from the administration which I have not heard as to why they do not or they cannot.

Mr. BROOKE. If the Senator will yield, we have been promised the implementing legislation since last fall. We have still to this date not received it.

Mr. JAVITS. Well, as I say, I do not think, you know, that is anything unreasonable, asking to see the shape of the implementing legislation, unless there is some good reason why it cannot be tendered.

Mr. BROOKE. Which we do not have.

Mr. JAVITS. Which we do not have, and the Senator is just as reasonable as I am. Though I am a strong proponent of the treaties, I think whatever the Senate needs to judge them, it should have. As to the finances, that has been gone into very deeply, and the record is very complete on that score. The drug business has now been gone into very deeply, as it should have been.

All I wanted to point out is my respect for whatever the Senator says and whatever he thinks on any issue, whether I agree or disagree.

Second, this record now is very full of a great deal of the information which the Senator has sought, and I would most respectfully offer to the Senator my facilities, and I think I can be presumptuous enough to offer those of the Foreign Relations Committee, with a view toward satisfying the Senator or his staff, if he delegates it, as to what is in, so that the Senator can quickly, without going through volumes, refer to it, and what is not in; and I think it would be helpful to the Senator to undertake that review.

I do not think the Senator intended any derogation. If he did, as I am sure he did not, he is too much of a lawyer for that—the facts are very replete already, and I think the Senator should apprise himself fully that there is a complete record, and be brought up completely to date on everything we actually have of the kind he has discussed.

Mr. BROOKE. If the Senator will yield there, I appreciate the Senator's very generous and kind remarks. The Senator from New York, as he has said, is a very dear and close personal friend of mine, and a most distinguished member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I intend no disrespect nor any criticism of the hearings or the work that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and its very able staff have performed.

However, I beg to disagree with my friend from New York as to the completeness of the record insofar as what the financial obligation of the United States will be; and this is a matter of concern to me as well as the matter of the implementing legislation, which the Senator has said is of concern to him as well as to me.

The other point which I made was the need for the American people to know all of the facts relative to the Panama Canal treaties prior to a vote on ratification. I, for one, did not see the necessity for the closed session in the first instance. Frankly, I attended as much of those sessions as I could consistent with my responsibilities in the Appropriations and Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committees; but to me, just the appearance that we are trying to keep something from the American people, unless it is a matter of national security or a matter of the rights of individuals—they have to be protected, and I can understand that—should be avoided. To the greatest extent possible everything should be in open session. The public has a right to know. I just think that we have to have all of the information, and I would hope it will be.

Let me state to the distinguished Senator from New York that I have looked at and read the Foreign Relations Committee report. As a matter of fact, I have said to my constituents time after time that I would not even begin to make a decision on the Panama Canal treaties until the report of the Foreign Relations Committee, which is the appropriate committee having the responsibility in the main for looking very closely and in detail at the treaties, had been submitted and studied.

So I do respect the committee system, and I certainly have high regard, as the Senator knows, for the Committee on Foreign Relations. But I repeat the fact that you still cannot tell me today just what it is going to cost. I know you cannot specify it in its entirety; I said that in my remarks on the floor today, that we cannot hold you to an exact amount. But I am personally convinced that we still have an inadequate understanding of just how much it may ultimately cost the American people, and for how long they may pay the costs implicit in the treaties. That is one thing I think the record is not complete on, in addition to the question of the implementing legislation.

Mr. JAVITS. May I just speak to two points?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have the floor. I want to be as patient with Senators as I can, but I have a tight schedule also.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator allow us all 5 minutes, to the three of us? I will take 1 minute.

Mr. HELMS. Certainly; I will be glad to yield 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Thank you; I just wanted to make two points. First, I was not conscious of using the word "complete," and if I did use it, I apologize.

Mr. BROOKE. Thank you.

Mr. JAVITS. I am a lawyer, and there is no such word as "truth" and there is no such word as "complete."

Mr. BROOKE. One of the best lawyers in the country, in fact.

Mr. JAVITS. But I did feel, and I tried to say, that the record was replete, with 2,500 pages of questioning.

Mr. BROOKE. Oh, you said replete; I see.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, and with 1,700 pages of background documents. Second, as to the money, there will be a debate on that beginning tomorrow. I think we can project, subject to the usual consideration of a businessman's risk, about what it will cost.

Mr. BROOKE. Will you discuss the ambiguities regarding the $10 million to be paid Panama for actual cost of services I referred to? You will get into that as well?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. BROOKE. I look forward to that debate, to hear and listen to what the committee has done in that regard.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I guess the Senator from New York has the control of this 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Chafee) and the rest to Senator Mathias.

Mr. MATHIAS. Very briefly, the Senator from Massachusetts has introduced some very interesting questions and expressed his concerns here, and I think what he has raised points up a question in my own mind which I hope the Senator from New York and other members of the committee will be able to discuss in some detail, and that is how this operation by committee for the next 22 years is going to work out, the sort of joint effort which will be required between now and the year 2000, whether there has been thinking as to who will make the decisions, or how the decisions will be reached, in the operation of the canal.

These questions could affect the financial picture very greatly, and the committees, as we know, here in Congress, are great institutions for exposing issues and illuminating arguments and educating those who are privy to them, but they are not necessarily the best instruments for executive decisions. I think that is an area we want to look at very carefully.

Mr. BROOKE. Yes, I would certainly agree with our distinguished colleague from Maryland that that is a very important area that needs to be explored, but which to this date has not been explored, and which I think we should explore. I would hope in the days of debate to follow, we will explore it.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I would just like to congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts on his fine statement. However, I would like to take issue, if I might, with him on a couple of points.

The suggestion of the administration whisking this through, that it is a steamroller, I do not really think that is quite a fair suggestion. These treaties were signed on September 7, and there has been a good deal of advance discussion about them prior to that. Since September 7, it is as though an invasion had taken place in Panama, the number of people who have been down there to have a look. So I feel there has been some pretty thorough discussion of these treaties. At the earliest, it will be 5 months from when the treaties were signed to when they are even voted on.

Mr. BROOKE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. BROOKE. Does the Senator think that is an unreasonable period of time for a matter of this magnitude, considering the fact that even though it has been 5 months since the signing of the treaties, the implementing legislation has not to this minute been submitted to the Senate for its review?

Mr. CHAFEE. Well, I look on the implementing legislation as the tail that has got to follow the dog. In other words, the implementing legislation has to conform with the treaties.

Frankly, I do not have that concern over the implementing legislation because we have to know what is in the treaty, and we should have a thorough discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield 1 more minute to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. I know the Senator from North Carolina has been waiting patiently. I hope we can get further into this discussion.

Mr. BROOKE. I welcome this opportunity for discussion with my colleague. We have spent a lot of time on this matter, but I am not sure that we have spent it on substantive issues.

Mr. CHAFEE. I quite agree.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. HELMS. I would be delighted to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to address briefly three points the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts made.

First of all, I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not think it is fair to characterize the process pursued by the Senate as rushing to judgment.

Mr. BROOKE. I would say that the administration wants this ratified in such a short period of time without the benefit of all the facts. That is the question of judgment.

Mr. SARBANES. I think the Senate is trying very hard to get to the facts in a careful and thorough manner.

Second, on the economic questions, I think the material on that issue is in the hearing record. There are a lot of conflicting opinions on that issue and where you come out depends on the assumptions you are prepared to make and the premises Senators are prepared to work upon.

In fairness to the President, what he said in his speech was that the payment to Panama, the payment provided under the treaty to Panama—would come from tolls and responsible economic analysis shows that to be possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to my friend from Virginia (Mr. Harry F. Byrd, Jr.) and then I believe the distinguished Senator from Kentucky has a conference report.

Mr. FORD. I have a conference report which will take 1 minute. After these people, the Senator may not have any time left.

Mr. HELMS. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not leave.

Mr. BROOKE. I would never leave when the distinguished Senator from Virginia is prepared to talk.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr. I thank my friend from Massachusetts.

I noted comments were made with regard to the implementing legislation. I noted Mr. Herbert J. Hansell, a legal advisor to the Department of State, testified before the Foreign Relations Committee on September 29, 1977. This is what Mr. Hansell said, he being the legal advisor to the State Department:

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have this opportunity to report to this committee on the proposed legislation to implement these treaties that is being prepared for submission to Congress in the near future. That legislation, of course, will be an essential component of the overall program for the implementation of the treaties.

That, I believe, is the point which the able Senator from Massachusetts was making a little while ago.

Mr. BROOKE. Precisely, and that is the point that the Senator from Rhode Island completely missed because he felt it was the tail wagging the dog. I do not think it is the tail wagging the dog. I think it is another essential part of the dog as is the tail.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr. The legal advisor of the State Department says it is an essential component of the treaties.

Mr. BROOKE. Of course.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr. Then in another statement at that same meeting before the Foreign Relations Committee on September 29, Mr. Hansell said:

We hope to have a complete draft available for submission to both Houses of Congress within several weeks. We have been at work on it for some period of time. Certainly, before the end of October we expect to have it to you.

Well, October has come and gone, November has come and gone, December has come and gone, January has come and gone. February is here and is about to go next week.

So I join with the able Senator from Massachusetts in expressing some dismay that the Congress has not been provided that information, although it was promised not later than the latter part of October.

Mr. BROOKE. I appreciate the information given by my able colleague from Virginia.

I also refer to the Foreign Relations Committee report, supplemental and minority views, where the head of the Congressional Budget Office informed the Committee:

Clearly, because the implementing legislation has not been submitted, the complete estimate of the budget impact of the treaties is impracticable at this time.

And we still do not have that. Obviously, it is still impracticable at this time to find out what the budget impact will be.

I think now we should be talking about what the budget impact would be before we talk about any legislation.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr. And since we do not know what the budget impact is, we do not know what the impact will be on the American taxpayers.

Mr. BROOKE. That is correct.

Mr. FORD. I ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina if he will yield me 1 minute.

Mr. HELMS. I yield.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the Neutrality Treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am glad to have this opportunity to present some of my views.

I have been somewhat dismayed during the past 2 days here on several occasions when it has been asserted that the Panamanian drug connection is irrelevant to the Panama Canal Treaty. With all the vigor that I possess I dissent from that position. One Senator said in this Chamber earlier this afternoon that, in effect, it is silly—and that is the word he used—he said it is silly to be concerned about the dictatorship in Panama even if it had been shipping enormous amounts of heroin and other deadly drugs into the United States.

Well, Mr. President, I say to that Senator, and I say to all others who say this is irrelevant, tell that to the people of the United States, the mothers and fathers whose children are hooked on heroin. Do not just say it here in this Senate Chamber. Tell it to the parents. Tell it to the addicts themselves.

I am confident that the victims of drugs, direct and indirect victims, which Panama has channeled into the United States will refute that argument that it is silly, that it is irrelevant, with all of the strength they possess.

Those who have been heartsick to see lives lost and lives ruined, characters destroyed, even minds blanked out—none of these, Mr. President, will think that it is irrelevant or that it is silly to consider the damage that has been done to the United States by Panama.

Now, let us get that on the record, and I hope this Senator does not hear the pretentious argument again that it is irrelevant, because it is the most relevant thing we can talk about.

While we are talking about the victims of the drug traffic, Mr. President, let us think about the innocent citizens of this country who have been victimized by addicts who are trying to get enough money for a quick fix. Who is going to look out for the interests of the elderly people who have been mugged on their way to the grocery store by addicts looking for an easy mark? Who is going to look out for the ordinary citizen whose home has been victimized by petty burglars, and some not so petty?

Mr. President, let us not imagine and let us not have the American people believe that we are talking about one or two cases in which Panamanians were involved. Oh, no, Mr. President, we are talking about an organized system in which Panama served as the vital link, an organized system which was carried on with the knowledge and the complicity of high officials of the Panamanian Government.

This Senator was not in favor of the closed session yesterday and this morning. He said on this floor, and I suppose I can say this lawfully in open session, the Senator from North Carolina was standing right there, and he said that the session ought to be open because the American people deserved to know what we were talking about. As it turned out, there was almost no necessity whatsoever of closed doors, driving the press out, because there was not any information disclosed on this floor yesterday, with the possible exception of the grand jury indictment, that would have been harmful to U.S. interests.

In any event, the importance of the key cases of drug smuggling into the United States cannot be underestimated. The Rafael Richard case involved some 150 pounds or more of pure heroin. That is just one case. I hope my distinguished colleagues and the American people understand the importance of that one case, Mr. President, because 150 pounds of heroin is enough heroin on the street to supply all the addicts of New York City for a full month.

Was this Rafael Richard just a poor, misled boy? Don't you believe it, Mr. President, because the facts do not support such a conclusion. Mr. Richard, however you pronounce it, had made five previous trips carrying heroin. For almost half a year, this one criminal—and I use that word advisedly—this criminal had supplied the heroin to terrorize the city of New York with addict-related crimes. There was just that much involved.

So I say again, Mr. President, do not try to tell this Senator that it is irrelevant or that it is silly to talk about Panama's drug connection. That one seizure that we discussed yesterday was placed in value at $27 million. I emphasize that that is just one seizure. We know that it was only one in a continuing system. The money came right out of the pockets of Americans through armed robbery and burglary and prostitution. Any social worker, any policeman on the beat, can describe the ravages of heroin trafficking in our society.

We also know, Mr. President, that this one case that we talked about yesterday involved not just a single man; it involved a large conspiracy. It is now public knowledge that a high member of the Panamanian Foreign Service was directly implicated, a high ambassador, who is the brother of the head of state in Panama, the dictator in Panama who took control of that country at gunpoint. That is what we are talking about, Mr. President. We are not talking about something irrelevant or silly. We are talking about facts.

Let us not kid the American people. I do not think it is possible to kid the American people. As a matter of fact, this Senator wishes that, somehow, we could have a plebiscite in this country and let the American people vote on this proposition that the Senate is debating today.

The dictator of Panama knew about the crimes. He condoned them by not taking action. He protected his brother. Even the proponents of the treaties acknowledge that.

Now, a news account earlier this week reported that Omar Torrijos now says that he would turn over his brother if the United States would offer proof to support the charges. How beneficent of him. Obviously, Omar Torrijos does not understand the ways of a free society. He does not understand the separation of the judiciary from the legislative and executive branches. He wants to prejudge the evidence.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a grand jury has said that the evidence is credible, and that should be enough to bring this man to trial. Why was not the brother of Omar Torrijos turned over 5 years ago? The dictator Torrijos now says that he did not turn him over because it would have killed his mother, who was alive then. I hope that my distinguished colleagues will think about that. Omar Torrijos was worried about how such a trial would affect his mother.

Well, what about the mothers of the addicts whose lives have been destroyed by the conspiracy in which Moises Torrijos was involved, h'm?

The distinguished chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence, in his report, which was made public yesterday, has said that Torrijos knew about drug trafficking and did not take sufficient action to stop his brother's activities. Mr. President, that is a very significant conclusion, and the inevitable question is, why did Omar Torrijos take no action? Was it really because he feared for his mother's health? Anybody who believes that will believe anything. As a matter of fact, anybody who believes that, I invite to meet me immediately after the Senate session. I would like to sell him some stock in the Brooklyn Bridge.

Panama is a very small country. Everybody knows everybody's business. Certainly, this dictator, with full intelligence resources at his command, knows everybody's business. So, Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina can only conclude that the dictator failed to act because he approved of the activity of his brother and others directly or indirectly connected with the Torrijos regime.

Just look at the facts. His brother, the Ambassador, assisted the transfer of narcotics through Panamanian Customs. His Foreign Minister, Juan Tack, signed the illegal diplomatic passport that Richard sought to use for the smuggling operation. From the Him case, we know that Panama's Tocumen International Airport was the center of narcotics transfer and routing and we know that the Guardia Nacional was involved in protecting the shipments of these drugs. Now, this may not be enough to bring into a court of law to convict the dictator, Omar Torrijos, but the Senate of the United States, presumably representing the people of this country and the interest and the security of America, is not seeking to convict him in a court of law.

What we are debating, I presume, and yet I sometimes wonder, what we are debating is whether or not we should go into partnership with him, not whether we have enough evidence to convict him in a court.

We are debating the question of whether Omar Torrijos is a reliable ally and, in any sense, a friend of the United States.

Again I say, Mr. President, that I do wish that the American people—the American people—could have a vote on this question.

Now, one distinguished Senator has been quoted as saying that our debate yesterday was a waste of time.

In the first place, I did not see that Senator on the floor once yesterday. He may have come in and left, but I was here most of the day and I did not see him on the floor one time, so not much of his time was wasted.

But, in any case, the Senator from North Carolina does not agree that debating this drug issue is or was a waste of time.

Certainly, it is not as much a waste of time as it might be to go down to Cuba, for example, and embrace the dictator Torrijos' ally and friend, Fidel Castro, and Senators have done that.

Now, if we want to talk about wasting time, I place that kind of activity in nomination.

When Torrijos left Washington after issuing the statement of understanding with President Carter, he flew back home on a route that led directly over Cuba, and as he flew by Havana, Torrijos radioed a message of felicitations and triumph to his bearded friend in Cuba.

For us, that message was clear. If you embrace Torrijos, then you are embracing Castro.

No, Mr. President, it is not and it was not and it will not be a waste of time to debate the criminal involvement of the Panamanian Government in narcotics trafficking.

In 1973, the House Merchant Marine Committee estimated that one-twelfth of the heroin coming into the United States came with the participation of Panama.

Now, based on evidence that I have received in the past few days, Mr. President, I am confident that that estimate was an understatement, because in recent conversations that I have had with former drug enforcement officials of the United States, men who had firsthand knowledge of the narcotics situation at the time of the indictment of Moises Torrijos, I have learned that the proportion of the drug traffic controlled by Panama in that period was at least one-half.

Now, I acknowledge that precise figures are impossible. But I am told, by people who have reason to know what they are talking about, that one-half, or even more than one-half, is a reasonable—a reasonable—estimate.

We cannot understand why the information relating to the Panamanian drug traffic is relevant unless we put the issue into its international perspective.

Panama has a unique position both in its geography and in the history of international law enforcement.

Without Panama, the heroin explosion that occurred in the late 1960's and in the early 1970's could never have taken place. It would not have happened except for Panama.

Of all the nations in the world, only Panama refused to join with the civilized nations of the world in an international crackdown. Only Panama, Mr. President, only Panama refused to cooperate.

This is the nation, Panama, governed by the same military dictatorship that we now propose to take as an intimate partner in the operations of our canal, and as our ultimate successor by the year 2000.

I heard on the floor over and over, ad infinitum and almost to the point of nausea, that General Torrijos will not last forever. Well, I certainly agree with that. I have had my fill of the man already.

We hear constantly that the patterns of narcotics traffic are changing and that we should think of the Panamanian people rather than of the present regime.

On the contrary, Mr. President, the Panama Canal is a public utility that serves the world. There are many nations for whom the canal is far more important than it is for Panama. The United States, as owner and operator of the canal, has compiled a record of unparalleled service, efficiency, and benefit to all nations.

It is, therefore, particularly relevant, if we now propose to turn the canal over to proven racketeers who have already demonstrated that they put personal gain ahead of the suffering, anguish, and social injury which the narcotics traffic creates throughout the world.

Panama's geographical position is unique, Mr. President. In a moment I shall go into detail to explain why it is under greater pressures from international drug traffickers than any other location in the world.

At the present time, the Canal Zone is U.S. territory under article IV, section 3 of the U.S. Constitution. For narcotics law enforcement purposes, U.S. laws and U.S. standards of enforcement apply in the Canal Zone.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, without the Canal Zone, we would have never broken the back of the heroin trade as it existed as recently as 1972. We were able to do so in the face of the determined opposition—the determined opposition—of Panama.

The exercise of our sovereign powers in the Canal Zone, the presence of U.S. officials on the spot, the control of the facilities and installations were the key elements that made enforcement possible.

Well, then, Mr. President, we should ask, what is the impact of the treaties on narcotics enforcement?

Under the new treaty, the United States gives up control of the ports, including piers, warehouses, and the stevedoring.

Under article III, section 6, Panama takes over customs and immigration.

Under article IX, section 1, it is recognized that the laws of Panama apply to the U.S.-use areas.

Under article XI, section 1, Panama assumes plenary jurisdiction over the former Canal Zone.

Even during the 30-month transition period, Mr. President, the United States exercises criminal jurisdiction only over U.S. citizens, citizen-employees, dependents, and members of the U.S. Armed Forces, and only for offenses committed during that 30-month transition period and committed in the U.S.-use areas.

Moreover, when we read the implementation agreements we see specific language that shows Panamanian anxiety to control all matters related to drugs.

That is what we have been talking about for the better part of 2 days. That is what some in this Chamber and some outside this Chamber have labeled as irrelevant and on one occasion today, by one Senator, silly. No way, Mr. President.

In the Agreement in Implementation of article III of the Panama Canal Treaty, article XIX, "Criminal Jurisdiction," it provides the following:

4. (a) The Authorities of the Republic of Panama shall notify the authorities of the United States as promptly as possible of the arrest of any United States citizen-employee or dependent.

(b) The following procedures shall govern the custody of an accused United States citizen-employee or dependent over whom the Republic of Panama is to exercise its jurisdiction:

(i) If the accused is detained by the authorities of the Republic of Panama he shall, except when charged with murder, rape, robbery with violence, trafficking in drugs, or crimes against the security of the Panamanian State, be handed over on request to the authorities of the United States in whose custody he shall remain until completion of all judicial proceedings and thereafter until custody is requested by authorities of the Republic of Panama for the execution of a sentence.

(ii) When charged with murder, rape, robbery with violence, trafficking in drugs, or crimes against the security of the Panamanian State, the accused will remain in the custody of the authorities of the Republic of Panama. * * *

Identical provisions appear in the Agreement in Implementation of article IV, article VI (5), with regard to military personnel, their dependents, and the civilian component.

It is to be noted that these provisions refer not to the transition period, but to the general implementation of the treaties. It is highly significant that Panama, by specific exception, demands custody of those accused of drug trafficking. If Panama's record for prosecution and control of narcotics record were excellent, or even good, then the language would be heartening. But Panama's record of coverup, participation in, and protection of, the drug rackets strongly suggests that the Panamanian interest lies more in the manipulation of narcotics control rather than real action.

The only tool of enforcement left would be drug enforcement agency agents attached to the U.S. Embassy in Panama. Such agents lack clear authority; they have been hamstrung and rendered ineffective in the past by political restrictions. It can be assumed that such restrictions would increase under the treaties because of the overriding necessity of preserving the cooperation of the Panamanian Government in the operation of the canal.

PANAMA'S ROLE IN THE NARCOTICS TRADE

It is important to understand that Panama's role in the narcotics trade is not confined to isolated instances. We are not talking about isolated bilateral deals between criminals in Panama and criminals in the United States. We are talking about a vast international network of criminals around the world that has used Panama, with the approval, protection, and participation of the Panamanian Government—the same government with which we are asked to conclude these treaties.

Before 1968, the pattern of narcotics traffic moved from Turkey to Europe, principally Marseilles. From Marseilles, it moved to the United States, sometimes directly to New York, sometimes indirectly through Mexico or Montreal.

But about that time, our drug enforcement officers in U.S. Customs noticed a change. They were no longer picking up smugglers with big loads of heroin of a hundred pounds or so. Instead, they were picking up small couriers each carrying only 2 or 3 pounds.

Customs officials ran a profile on those arrested and noted a common profile: Most were petty criminals from the countries of the lower cone of South America. Yet they were coming to the United States from Europe.

Moreover, there were other similarities. Certain travel agencies invariably issued their tickets; visas were granted at the same place. Investigation and information received from those arrested and convicted led to the discovery that these petty criminals were recruited and controlled by an international fraternity of criminals. Many who had fled Europe as fugitives who had committed capital crimes had taken up residence in South America under false identities. Nevertheless, they maintained bonds of blood and trust with their counterparts in southern France, Corsica, and Italy.

With the development of these profiles it was an easy thing to pinpoint suspects in advance. Customs executed a rash of successful arrests in a matter of weeks. But the organizers were untouched.

Despite the successful clampdown in New York, the narcotics problem continued to grow. Then U.S. Customs noted that couriers with the same profile (petty criminals from the southern cone) were coming into international airports in Florida, Louisiana, Texas. It was a fairly simple matter to shut off this traffic once the key was discovered. However, the shift pointed to one thing: Bulk heroin was now coming directly from Marseilles to Asuncion, Paraguay.

CONTRABANDISTA SYSTEM

Even though the petty couriers had been cut off again, by 1970 the heroin problem in the United States could only be described as an "explosion." Customs officials were baffled as to how it was getting in. Finally, working on a small clue passed along by a criminal informant, they turned to an investigation of the so-called contrabandista system.

The contrabandista system was well known but did not directly involve the violation of U.S. laws. It was based on the tariffs of 200 to 300 percent that Latin American countries placed on the importation of U.S. luxury goods. A cargo plane load of merchandise—usually a vintage aircraft with second-rate pilots—would leave Miami with its manifests in order.

The first stop was Panama, conveniently 3,000 miles south of the United States. At Tocumen Airport in Panama, the cargo plane would be put under the control of the Guardia Nacional. On the next day, the plane and its contents would leave Tocumen, this time with a new manifest from the Government of Panama certifying that the plane was empty. In South America, the plane of contraband goods would land at a remote private airstrip, unload, and then proceed to its announced destination. Thus when it arrived, the false Panamanian manifest would be correct: The plane actually was empty.

This highly organized operation was managed by the chief air traffic controller of Tocumen Airport; it was not accomplished without regular assessment of "fees." It was so successful that it was extended down to Asuncion, Paraguay, where a special airport was built, complete with warehouses. From Asuncion, short air hops could be made for "distribution" of the contraband goods to Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay.

As already pointed out, no U.S. laws were violated, since the planes left the United States with their papers in order. It was Panama that was the kingpin of the operation because Panama supplied the false manifests. Furthermore, in another variation, contraband was warehoused in the Colon Free Zone—an area also under the control of the Guardia Nacional—for the convenience of customers who arrived in Panama to take "orders."

DRUGS: THE RETURN TRIP

Once the planes arrived in Paraguay, there was very little to take back on the return trip—horses, perhaps, or exotic tropical fish.

But one U.S. Customs had concluded that bulk heroin had found a new route from Marseilles to Asuncion, it was a simple deduction how it was getting into the United States: It was the contrabandista system in reverse, with Panama as the kingpin. The "empty" planes were now loaded with heroin under the floor boards. Close inspection of planes coming from Panama began to pay off.

THE JOACHIM HIM CASE

In February 1971, an indictment was issued for Joachim Him, the chief air traffic controller at Tocumen Airport. Him was not only providing a way station for the narcotics traffic under the protection of the Guardia Nacional; he was directly involved in routing traffic and organizing sales in the United States. Knowing that the Panamanian Government would give no assistance in dealing with the Him case, and knowing also that the U.S. State Department would attempt to impede any efforts to seek such assistance, U.S. narcotics agents waited until Him fell into U.S. jurisdiction by attending a baseball game in the U.S. Canal Zone.

Him was arrested, brought to Texas (the scene of many of his drug sales operations), convicted, and put in jail.

This case is a superb example of the way that the exercise of sovereign powers by the United States in the Canal Zone facilitated the interdiction of an international drug traffic leading through Asuncion to Marseilles. Without the arrest and conviction of Him, the backbone of the trade route would never have been broken. The Him case was not hearsay and allegation; it was based on provable evidence which brought conviction and a long jail term. Him alone was responsible for sending over a million dollars worth of heroin.

The intimations of noncooperation on the part of Panama proved true. A campaign of vituperation and protest was immediately begun by the Panamanian Government. According to sworn statements given to investigators for the House Merchant Marine Committee the campaign of protest was personally directed and led by Omar Torrijos and Foreign Minister Juan Tack.

THE RAPHAEL RICHARD CASE

In July 1971, Raphael Richard, Jr., was arrested in J.F.K. International Airport with 151 pounds of heroin in a suitcase. Also arrested were Nicholas Polanco and Guillermo Gonzalez, and three others. Polanco was an associate of Moises Torrijos, formerly his chauffeur and bodyguard. Gonzalez, no relation to Him Gonzalez, was, like Him, a former chief air traffic controller at Tocumen Airport.

Like the Him case, this was no matter of hearsay or allegation. The heroin was real. It was worth at least $27 million. Nor was Richard a naive young man abusing his father's privileges. Richard bore a diplomatic passport, but he had no right to have one. His father was Ambassador to the Republic of China or Taiwan; but the son's passport was in his own name and had been illegally signed by Foreign Minister Juan Tack. And Richard, Jr., admitted that he had made five previous flights carrying heroin to New York, four in the fall of 1970, and one in January 1971.

The magnitude of the operation becomes clear when it is realized that just one such shipment is enough to supply the addicts of New York City for a full month.

The arrest and conviction of Richard and his confederates did not bring any cries of rejoicing from Panama; the incident merely added to the growing cries of protest against U.S. enforcement. Three U.S. drug officials were declared persona non grata and were forced to leave Panama.

Once again the facts point to a major role of Panama in the international drug trade. The amounts brought in in the Richard case, and their frequency, establish conclusively that Panama was a major conduit. It was no casual connection; it was an organized system. Together with the Him Gonzalez case it points to high-level government involvement. The striking coincidence of another former air traffic controller among the cast of characters points to a protected fraternity of smuggling operations.

THE INDICTMENT OF MOISES TORRIJOS

But the Richard case led to something further: the indictment of Moises Torrijos, brother of the dictator. U.S. law holds that anyone involved in a narcotics smuggling operation whose end is the United States is guilty of a crime punishable in the United States. The evidence given to the New York grand jury by the participants in the Richard operations led to the judgment by the grand jury that the evidence of Moises' involvement was serious enough to warrant prosecution.

Once again, this was no hearsay or vague allegations; it was sworn testimony of participants. It pointed to direct involvement of the highest level of Panamanian officialdom. Moises was himself an ambassador, and had the protection of his brother.

Moreover, the case against Moises was strong enough for a warrant to be issued for his arrest, and for a customs agent in Panama to seek to effect his arrest in the Canal Zone. Once again the exercise of U.S. jurisdiction in the Canal Zone was the only solution to a problem that was eating at the heart of U.S. cities. If the arrest had been successful, the Panamanian connection—the linchpin of the whole narcotics traffic—could have been removed at one fell swoop.

But the U.S. State Department thought otherwise. For diplomatic reasons, it preferred to avoid an international incident. It preferred to tamper with the judicial process and to interfere with the course of justice. The executive branch informed Omar Torrijos of the sealed indictment of his brother—an indictment whose very existence was supposed to remain secret. Furthermore, they tipped off Moises of the impending attempt by U.S. customs to arrest Moises in the Canal Zone, so that he slipped out of the net.

PANAMA'S RECORD OF NONCOOPERATION

Panama's record of noncooperation stands alone. Customs officials following the clues given by narcotics suspects and convicts traced backward along the heroin route. In Paraguay even President Stroessner found it prudent to cooperate, and extradited Auguste Ricord, a top narcotics trafficker who had never even set foot in the United States. The conviction of Ricord opened further doors in Latin America. Chile, Brazil, and Argentina, using U.S. customs intelligence, made large seizures, and put many traffickers behind bars.

Finally, as the trail led back to Europe, 31 indictments were issued for individuals in France, Belgium, and Italy, on the basis of customs intelligence; about 20 more were issued on the basis of work by the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs. Through the cooperation of all these governments, these individuals were extradited, brought to the United States, and convicted.

Only Panama stood alone as noncooperative and actively interfering with enforcement efforts. Only Panama stood alone with the brother of the head of state indicted with the main international airport the transit area sanctioned by the Government with the so-called Government free zone as the warehouse site for smuggling, and with the National Guard participating in security arrangements for narcotics.

Indeed, other nations were involved in narcotics trafficking, but never on such high levels and with such complete Government participation.

THE UNITED STATES AS PARTNER

The United States becomes partner with Panama in two ways. In the first place we become a partner in the act of handing over legal jurisdiction and facilities. It is a vote of confidence in the present Government with its record of corruption. In this act, we become collaborationists with the crimes of the past.

But we also become collaborators with Panama for the future. For the next 22 years we become the close partners with a government that, on the grounds of past history, cannot be trusted. If, once the treaties are safely ratified, Panama once more becomes the center of crime for international trafficking, there will be nothing that we can do about it. Yet we will have joint administration of the canal, joint defense of the canal. We will find ourselves implicated in everything that Panama does. There will be no way that we can draw back, without abandoning the canal. Our management skills will be contributing to Panama's financial success, strengthening a government that does not deserve our support. We ought not to be involved. We ought not to give the canal way.

TREATY PROVISIONS TO NARCOTICS TRAFFICKING ISSUES

Mr. President, for the convenience of my distinguished colleagues, I have gathered together provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty and the related Implementation Agreements which relate directly to narcotics trafficking issues.

They are as follows:

Article III, section 6 specifies the transfer of customs immigration, and the courts in the former Canal Zone to Panama. The transfer of customs is crucial to drug enforcement.

Article III, section 6 incorporates by reference the Implementation Agreement to article III, which contains relevant provisions.

Article IV, section 2 incorporates by reference the Implementation Agreement to article IV, which contains relevant provisions.

Article V prevents the Panama Canal Commission from engaging in narcotics intelligence, which is presently an activity of the Panama Canal Company.

Article IX specifies that the law of Panama (including Panamanian narcotics law) shall apply in the installations of the United States.

Article XI limits, during the transition period, the jurisdiction of the United States and reserves jurisdiction to Panama for the broad sweep of offenses.

Article XIX of the Agreement in Implementation of article III of the Panama Canal Treaty reserves custody of those U.S. citizen-employees of the Panama Canal Commission who commit drug offenses to Panama.

Article VI of the Agreement in Implementation of article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty makes similar provisions for U.S. military personnel and the civilian component.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the relevant parts of the Panama Canal Treaty and the Implementation Agreements be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

TREATY DRAFT OF JULY 10, 1977

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, many Members of this body have expressed a legitimate interest in the final concessions that were made to Panama in the closing weeks of the negotiations. The sanitized report of the Select Committee on Intelligence demonstrated clearly that certain events in mid-July may or may not have had a profound impact on the final shape of the treaty. The committees judgment was that it did not.

However, the public has a right to judge for itself. Fortunately, the State Department made available last week a July 10 draft of the treaty. On Monday the distinguished Senators from Utah inserted in the Record a comparison of essential points that were changed or had not been resolved by July 10, based upon the State Department draft.

Unfortunately, for some inexplicable reason, the draft provided by the State Department was in Spanish. The English draft was not made available. On short notice, therefore, a translation was provided by a talented staff member of the Senate Steering Committee, Miss Sylvia Castellanos, so that the distinguished Members of this body can study it at their leisure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, for the sake of convenience, the analysis and comparison inserted by Mr. Hatch on February 20 be printed again in the Record, along with the entire English translation of the Spanish July 10 draft provided by the State Department.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, follows:

ANALYSIS

According to a recently obtained preliminary draft of the Panama Canal Treaty, a number of significant concessions were made between July 10, the date on this document, and September 7, the date of signing of the final versions.

Several articles included in the official version do not exist in the preliminary draft. The latter contains no provisions for employment with the Panama Canal Commission (Article X, official document), or injunction against American Commission employees undertaking political activity in Panama (Article V). Similarly, the text does not address itself to the display of the Panamanian or American flag (Article VII). There is no mention either of the procedure to be used in the statement of possible disputes about the interpretation of the texts. (Article XIV).

A number of articles are substantially different. Whereas the official text (Article XII) calls for an American-Panamanian feasibility study of a possible sea-level canal, the preliminary draft flatly gives the U.S. the right to build it, with construction to begin within fifteen years after the entry into force of the treaty. In the latter document, the clause giving Panama veto power over construction of a canal in a third country by the United States does not exist.

Differences exist with regard to the payments to be made to Panama. The annual $10 million payment in return for the public services Panama assumes in the former Canal Zone is given no mention. (This draft does not include details on the other payments, which were apparently still being negotiated at the time).

There are also variations with regard to the procedure to be followed in connection with certain lands (Article IX). The principal one relates to lands to which the licensing procedure is not applicable, or ceases to be applicable following the entry into force of the treaty. Under the July draft, individuals who own real property located on these lands may continue using the land at a cost no higher than that being paid before the enactment of the treaty. Under it, furthermore, Panama must allow the individuals to buy the land at a price which cannot exceed $500 an acre. In connection with the transfer of U.S. government property to Panama, (Article XII, official treaty) the Panama Railroad is not mentioned.

Under Article VIII of the official treaty, up to 20 officials of the Panama Canal Commission qualify for diplomatic immunity. Under the July draft, by contrast, a far higher number, 75, may receive it.

The provisions for the termination of the agreement are different in the two texts. While the final version calls for the treaty to expire on December 31, 1999, under the July draft it would end on that date or any time thereafter, with one year's prior notice required of the party wishing to terminate the agreement.

In the July draft, the section of the Annex detailing functions which may thereafter be performed by the Panama Canal Commission is not present. The section listing the functions which the Commission shall not perform exists in the preliminary draft, but two clauses are omitted from it. These are "commercial pier and dock service, such as the handling of cargo and passengers" and the blanket statement, "Any other commercial activity of similar nature, not related to the management operation or maintenance of the Canal." At present pier and dock service is one of the principal sources of revenue of the Panama Canal Company.

In comparing the finished English and Spanish version of the Panama Canal Agreement, a number of discrepancies come to light. The Spanish text "to handle" as the translation "to manage" in the context of American activities; similarly, it describes the Panama Canal Commission as having a "Board of Directors" which will "direct," while the English text refers to a "Board" which will "supervise." It is interesting to note that these problems are not present in the Spanish language July draft. Both "to manage" and "shall be supervised by a Board" are translated accurately.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY, JULY 10, 1977

The Republic of Panama and the United States of America:

Recognizing their important mutual interest in the continuous effective operation of the Panama Canal for the benefit of international commerce;

Wishing to strengthen the ties of friendship and cooperation which have historically existed between them;

Having decided to improve their relationship with respect to the operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal and to eliminate, once and for all, those aspects of the prior relationship which have been a cause of conflict between them; and

Acting in the spirit of the Joint Declaration of Principles initiated by the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Panama and the Secretary of State of the United States on February 7, 1974;

Have decided to create a new treaty to serve as a basis for a new relationship between them, in order to achieve these common objectives and have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I

Establishment of a new relationship

1. At the moment of its entry into force, this Treaty cancels and serves as substitute for the Convention between the Republic of Panama and the United States of America, signed in Washington, November 18, 1903 and those treaties and related agreements stipulated in Annex A of this Treaty.

2. In accordance with the terms of this Treaty and related agreements, the Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America, for the duration of this Treaty, the rights necessary to regulate the transit of ships through the Panama Canal, and to manage, operate, maintain, improve, protect and defend the Canal. The Republic of Panama guarantees to the United States of America the peaceful use of the land and water areas necessary for these purposes. The Republic of Panama shall participate increasingly in the management and protection and defense of the Canal, as provided in this Treaty.

3. The Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall cooperate to assure the uninterrupted and efficient operation of the Panama Canal for the benefit of international commerce.

ARTICLE II

Protection and defense

1. The Republic of Panama and the United States of America commit themselves to protect and defend the Panama Canal, in the manner stipulated later in these documents. Each Party shall act in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack or other actions which threaten the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it.

2. For the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall have the primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal. For this purpose, the Republic of Panama confers on the United States of America the rights to station, train, and move military forces within its territory and to use areas and installations located within it. Said areas and installations are specified in the Agreement in implementation of this Article, signed this date. The use of these areas and installations and the legal regime applicable to the armed forces of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall be regulated by the aforesaid agreement.

3. In order to facilitate the participation and cooperation of the forces of both Parties in the protection and defense of the Canal, the Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall establish a Combined Board comprised of senior military representatives who shall have equal standing. These representatives shall be charged by their respective governments with consulting and cooperating on all matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the Canal, and with planning for actions to be taken in concert for that purpose. Such combined protection and defense arrangements shall not inhibit the identity or lines of authority of the armed forces of the Republic of Panama or the United States of America. The Combined Board, inter alia, shall provide for coordination and cooperation with respect to:

(a) the preparation of emergency plans for the protection and defense of the Canal based upon the cooperative efforts of the armed forces of both Parties;

(b) the planning and conduct of combined military exercises; and

(c) the conduct of Panamanian and United States military operations with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal. The Combined Board shall, at five-year intervals throughout the duration of this Treaty, review the resources being made available by the two Parties for the protection and defense of the Canal, and shall make appropriate recommendations to the two governments respecting projected requirements, the efficient utilization of available resources of the two Parties, and other matters of mutual interest with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

ARTICLE III

Operation and management of the canal

1. The United States of America undertakes to manage, operate and maintain the Panama Canal, its works, installations and auxiliary equipment, and to facilitate the transit of ships.

2. The Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, confers on the United States of America the corresponding rights necessary to fulfill these responsibilities, including the rights to:

(a) use for these purposes, at no cost, the various installations and areas (including the Panama Canal) and waters, as specified in the Agreement in implementation of this Article, signed this date, as well as such other areas and installations as are made available to the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements, and take the measures necessary to ensure sanitation of such areas;

(b) make such improvements and alterations to the aforesaid installations and areas as it deems appropriate, consistent with the terms of this Treaty;

(c) make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules with respect to navigation and maritime matters, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements;

(d) establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges, and establish and modify methods of their assessment;

(e) regulate relations with employees of the United States Government;

(f) provide supporting services to facilitate the performance of its responsibilities under this Article;

(g) issue and enforce regulations for the effective exercise of the rights and responsibilities of the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements; and

(h) exercise any other right granted under this Treaty, or otherwise agreed upon between the two Parties.

3. Pursuant to the foregoing concession of rights, the United States of America shall, in accordance with the provisions of United States Law and the terms of this Treaty, carry out the responsibilities stipulated in paragraph 1 of this Article by means of an agency (hereinafter referred to as the "Administration of the Panama Canal") which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America. The agencies of the government of the United States of America known as the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government shall cease to operate within the territory of the Republic of Panama, including the areas which formerly constituted the Canal Zone, upon the entry into force of this Treaty.

(a) The Panama Canal Administration will be under the supervision of a Board composed of nine members, five of whom shall be nationals of the United States of America and four of whom shall be Panamanian nationals proposed by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such positions by the United States of America.

(b) Should the Republic of Panama request the United States of America to remove a Panamanian national from membership on the Board, the United States of America shall agree to such request. In that event, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian nationals for appointment by the United States of America to such position. In case of removal of a Panamanian member of the Board of Directors at the initiative of the United States of America, both parties will consult in advance in order to reach agreement concerning such removal, and the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America in his stead.

(c) The United States of America shall employ a national of the United States of America as Administrator of the Panama Canal Administration, and a Panamanian national as Deputy Administrator, through December 31, 1989. Beginning January 1, 1990, a Panamanian national shall be employed as the Administrator and a national of the United States of America shall occupy the position of Deputy Administrator. Such Panamanian nationals shall be proposed to the government of the United States of America by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such position by the United States of America.

(d) Should the United States of America remove the Panamanian national from his position as Deputy Administrator, or Administrator, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment to such position by the government of the United States of America.

4. The procedures for the discontinuance or transfer or those activities performed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty by the Panama Canal Company or the Canal Zone Government which are not to be carried out by the Panama Canal Administration, are set forth in Annex B.

5. The Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall establish a Panama Canal Consultative Committee, composed of an equal number of high-level representatives of the Republic of Panama and the United States of America, and which may appoint such subcommittees as it may deem appropriate. This Committee shall advise the Republic of Panama and the United States of America on matters of policy affecting the Canal's operation. In view of both Parties' special interest in the continuity and efficiency of the Canal operation in the future, the Committee shall advise on matters such as general tolls policy, employment and training policies to increase the participation of Panamanian nationals in the operation of the Canal, and international policies on matters concerning the Canal. The Committee's recommendations shall be transmitted to the two Governments, which shall give such recommendations full consideration in the formulation of such policy decisions.

6. In addition to the participation of Panamanian nationals at high management levels, as provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article, there shall be growing participation of Panamanian nationals at all other levels and areas of employment in the Panama Canal Administration, with the objective of preparing, in an orderly and efficient fashion, for the assumption by the Republic of Panama of full responsibility for the management, operation and maintenance of the Canal upon the expiration of the Treaty.

7. The use of the installations, areas and waters with respect to which the United States of America is granted rights pursuant to this Article, the regimes applicable to the ports of Balboa and Cristobal and the Panama Canal Railroad, and the rights and legal status of the United States Government agencies and employees, operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Article, shall be governed by the Agreement in implementation of this Article, signed this date.

ARTICLE IV

Protection of the environment

The Republic of Panama and the United States of America commit themselves to implement this Treaty in a manner consistent with the protection of the natural environment of the Republic of Panama. To this end, they shall consult and cooperate with each other in all appropriate ways to ensure that they shall give due regard to environmental considerations.

2. A Joint Commission on the Environment shall be established with equal representation from the Republic of Panama and the United States of America, which shall periodically review the implementation of this Treaty and shall recommend as appropriate to the two Governments ways to mitigate the adverse environmental impacts which might result from their respective actions pursuant to the Treaty.

3. The Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall furnish the Joint Commission on the Environment complete information on any action taken in accordance with this Treaty which, in the judgment of both, might have a significant effect on the environment. Such information shall be made available as far in advance as possible to facilitate the study by the Commission of any potential environmental problems and to allow for consideration of the recommendation of the Commission before the contemplated action is carried out.

ARTICLE V

Privileges and immunities

1. The installations owned or used by the agencies or instrumentalities of the United States of America operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, and their official archives and documents, shall be inviolable.

2. Agencies and instrumentalities of the Government of the United States of America operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama in all matters.

3. In addition to such other privileges and immunities as are afforded to the employees of the United States Government and their dependents pursuant to this Treaty, the United States of America may designate up to 75 officials of the Panama Canal Administration, who along with their dependents, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded to diplomatic agents and their dependents under international law and practice. The United States of America shall furnish to the Republic of Panama a list of the names of said officials and their dependents, identifying the positions they occupy in the Government of the United States of America, and shall keep such list current at all times.

ARTICLE VI

Laws, execution of laws, and judicial matters

1. The laws of the Republic of Panama shall apply in all its territory, including the areas made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty in accordance with the provisions of this treaty and related agencies. Nevertheless, the laws of the Republic of Panama shall not be applied to matters or events which occurred in the former Canal Zone prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

2. The rights of ownership, as recognized by the United States of America, enjoyed by natural or juridical private persons with respect to buildings and other improvements to real property located in the former Canal Zone shall be recognized by the Republic of Panama in conformity with its laws. If such properties are located within the areas subject to licensing procedures in connection with the use of the land, established in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements, the two Governments agree that licenses shall be issued to such persons so they may continue the present use of the land on which their property is located. With regard to the areas in the former Canal Zone to which the aforesaid procedures are not applicable, or may cease to be applicable during the life of this Treaty or upon its termination, the Republic of Panama, at any time during the five years following the entry into force of this Treaty, or, if later, the date on which the aforesaid licensing procedure ceases to be applicable, shall permit such persons to acquire the lands on which their buildings or improvements are located. The acquisition price shall be reasonable and, except as otherwise agreed by the two Governments, shall not exceed $500 an acre. During this five year period, the Republic of Panama shall permit such persons to continue using such lands at a cost not to exceed that which was in effect immediately before that period.

3. The Republic of Panama shall permit natural or juridical persons who, on the date of entry into force of this Treaty are engaged in business or non-profit activities at locations in the former Canal Zone, to continue such business or activities at those locations. To this end, the Republic of Panama shall issue them without delay all the licenses and authorizations which may be required in accordance with Panamanian law. If, subsequently, the Republic of Panama should require such persons to end their activities or vacate their properties for public purposes, the Republic of Panama will grant them compensation commensurate to an equitable market price.

4. The Republic of Panama shall not issue, adopt or enforce any law, decree, regulation, or international agreement which purports to regulate or would otherwise interfere with the exercise on the part of the United States of any right granted under this Treaty or related agreements.

5. Vessels transiting the Canal, and cargo, passengers and crews carried on such vessels shall be exempt from any taxes, fees, or other charges by the Republic of Panama. However, in the event such vessels call at a Panamanian port, they may be assessed charges incident thereto, such as charges for services provided to the vessel. The Republic of Panama may also require the passengers and crew disembarking from such vessels to pay such taxes, fees and charges as are established under Panamanian law for persons entering its territory. Such taxes, fees and charges shall be assessed on a nondiscriminatory basis.

6. The Republic of Panama and the United States of America will cooperate in taking such steps as may from time to time be necessary to guarantee the security of the Panama Canal Administration, its employees and their dependents, and their property, the Forces of the United States of America and the members thereof, the civilian component of the United States Forces, the dependents of members of the Forces and the civilian component, and their property, and the contractors of the Panama Canal Administration and of the United States Forces, their dependents, and their property. The Republic of Panama will adopt such legislation as may be needed to carry out the foregoing purposes and to punish any offenders.

ARTICLE VII

Transition article

1. In order to provide for an orderly transition to the full application of the jurisdictional arrangements established by this Treaty and related agreements, the provisions of this Article shall become applicable upon the date this Treaty enters into force, and shall remain in effect for thirty calendar months. The authority granted in this Article to the United States of America for this transition period shall supplement, and is not intended to limit, the full application and effect of the rights and authority granted to the United States of America elsewhere in this Treaty and in related agreements.

2. During this transition period, the criminal laws of the United States of America shall apply concurrently with those of the Republic of Panama in certain of the areas and installations made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty, in accordance with the following provisions:

(a) The Republic of Panama permits the authorities of the United States of America to have the primary right to exercise criminal jurisdiction over United States citizen employees of the Panama Canal Administration and their dependents, and members of the United States Forces and civilian component and their dependents, in the following cases:

(i) for any offense committed during the transition period within such areas and installations, and

(ii) for any offense committed prior to that period in the former Canal Zone. The Republic of Panama shall have the primary right to exercise jurisdiction over all other offenses committed by such persons, except as otherwise provided in this Treaty and related agreements or as may be otherwise agreed.

(b) Either Government may waive its primary right to exercise jurisdiction in a specific case or category of cases.

3. The United States of America shall retain the right to exercise jurisdiction in criminal cases relating to offenses committed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty in violation of the laws applicable in the former Canal Zone.

4. For the transition period, the United States of America shall retain police authority and maintain a police force in the aforementioned areas and installations. In such areas, the police authorities of the United States of America may take into custody any person not subject to their primary jurisdiction if such person is believed to have committed or to be committing an offense against applicable laws or regulations, and shall promptly transfer custody to the police authorities of the Republic of Panama. The Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall establish joint police patrols in agreed areas. Any arrests conducted by a joint patrol shall be the responsibility of the patrol member or members representing the Government having primary jurisdiction over the person or persons arrested.

5. The courts of the United States of America and related personnel, functioning in the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, may continue to function during the transition period for the judicial enforcement of the jurisdiction retained by the United States of America.

6. In civil cases, the civilian courts of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall have no jurisdiction over new cases of a private civil nature, but shall retain full jurisdiction to dispose of any civil cases, including admiralty cases, already instituted and pending before the courts prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

7. The laws, regulations, and administrative authority of the United States of America applicable in the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty shall, to the extent not inconsistent with this Treaty and related agreements, continue in force for the purpose of the exercise by the United States of America of law enforcement and judicial jurisdiction during the transition period. The United States of America may amend, repeal or otherwise change such laws, regulations and administrative authority. The two Parties shall consult concerning procedural and substantive matters relative to the implementation of this Article, including the disposition of cases pending at the end of the transition period and, in this respect, may enter into appropriate agreements.

8. During this transition period, the United States of America may continue to incarcerate individuals in the Republic of Panama or transfer them to penal installations in the United States of America to serve their sentences. The Parties shall conclude an agreement whereby nationals of either State, who are sentenced by the courts of the other State, may elect to serve their sentences in the installations located in their country of origin.

Minute adopted in relation to article VII

With reference to paragraph 2 of Article VII of the Panama Canal Treaty, the areas and installations to which the jurisdictional arrangements described in it are applicable are as follows:

2. During a period of fifteen years from the date of entry into force of this treaty, the United States of America will have the right to undertake the construction within the territory of the Republic of Panama of a sea level canal. If the United States should undertake such construction, the work shall be finished within a period of fifteen years from the date of its start, except to the extent that delays may occur through factors outside the control of the United States of America. Nevertheless, under no circumstances will the construction continue beyond the date of termination of this treaty without the consent of the Republic of Panama.

3. Both Treaties shall enter into force simultaneously six calendar months from the date of such exchange.

2. This Treaty shall end on December 31, 1999, provided that on December 31, 1998, or prior to that date, either of the Parties has notified the other of its intention to terminate this Treaty. If no such notification was made on December 31, 1998, or prior to that date, this Treaty will end a year after the date on which such notification is made. At such time as notification is given by either Party of its intention to terminate the Treaty, the Parties, without delay, will initiate consultations to consider the continuation of the arrangements between them regarding the Panama Canal which they consider convenient.

UNDERSTANDING NO. 1

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator Bellmon and myself, I have submitted an understanding which we propose to the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty. The understanding relates to the matter of the conditional annuity payment provided for in article XIII 4.C.

Article XIII 4.C. provides for an annual payment of up to $10 million to be paid out of canal operating revenues, "to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission * * *." The article goes on to say:

In the event Canal operating revenues in any year do not produce a surplus sufficient to cover this payment, the unpaid balance shall be paid from operating surpluses in future years in a manner to be mutually agreed.

We are told that the negotiators intentions were clear that at the expiration of the treaty there would be no obligation to pay any unpaid balance from previous years, in the event there was such unpaid balance. And in his February 6, 1978, letter to Senator Culver, Secretary of State Vance stated:

Any balance remaining due in the year 1999 would not be paid since the Commission has only a contingent obligation to make this payment, i.e., an obligation based on available surplus.

I think we need to be crystal clear on this, however, and that is the genesis of the understanding we are proposing. It will make it clear, in the proper form and fashion, that there is no obligation to pay any such amount after the date of the termination of the treaty.

Mr. President, the following is the language of our understanding:

Before the period at the end of the resolution of ratification, insert a comma and the following: "subject to the understanding, which is to be made a part of the instrument of ratification, that nothing in paragraph 4(c) of article XIII may be construed as obligating the United States of America to pay after the date of the termination of the Treaty any unpaid balance under such paragraph 4(c) which shall have accrued before such date."

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—EX. N, 95-1

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. Allen submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, Ex. N, 95-1.

AMENDMENT NO. 41

Mr. Bartlett submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Panama Canal Treaty, Ex. N, 95-1.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, article XIII, section 4(c) of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty provides that the Panama Canal Commission to be created by the new treaty will pay a sum of $10 million a year out of surplus revenues to the Government of Panama. This so-called "Contingency Payment" is above and beyond other payments to be provided by section 4 to the Government of Panama.

In addition, section 4 provides that, in the event insufficient surplus is generated in one year to make the contingency payment, the obligation to make the payment will carry over into subsequent years, thus increasing the chances that the Government of Panama will get its contingency payment. From testimony received by the Senate Armed Services Committee, it is clear that tremendous ambiguity exists as to how the tolls will be set to generate the revenue and how the debt will be accumulated. Our State Department maintains that, at end of 1999, this unpaid balance would not be an obligation of the Panama Canal Commission or the United States. Testimony during the Armed Services Committee hearing stated that Panamanian leaders may believe the contrary.

At this time, however, I wish to alert my colleagues to the relationship of article XIII, section 4(c) to article XIII, section 1 of the treaty which reads as follows:

Upon termination of this Treaty, the Republic of Panama shall assume total responsibility for the management, operation, and maintenance of the Panama Canal, which shall be turned over in operating condition and free of liens and debts, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

Section 1 makes it clear that the canal must be turned over free of debt, unless otherwise agreed, thus implying that the accumulation of contingency payment debts, if considered an obligation of the Panama Canal Commission, would become a just debt of the United States and would be payable by the United States upon termination of the Panama Canal Treaty in 1999. While such an interpretation is consistent with the language of the treaty, and consistent with the expectations of some Panamanians as reported to our committee, it is inconsistent with the notion that the contingency payment is to come only out of toll revenues and is not to involve appropriated funds. The contingency payment is to provide an economic incentive for the Government of Panama to cooperate in achieving an economically viable Panama Canal Commission and is not supposed to affect the taxpayer directly.

For that reason I am sending to the desk an amendment for printing which would provide that any accumulated obligations and debts of the Panama Canal Commission resulting from this contingency payment provision shall not be a just debt of the United States in the year 1999 and after.

The original language of section 4(c) reads as follows:

An annual amount of up to ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) per year, to be paid out of Canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission including amounts made pursuant to this Treaty. In the event Canal operating revenues in any year do not produce a surplus sufficient to cover this payment, the unpaid balance shall be paid from operating surpluses in future years in a manner to be mutually agreed.

My amendment would make the following changes:

At the end of paragraph 4(c) of article XIII, add the following: "Nothing in this subparagraph may be construed to commit the United States of America to pay any part of such unpaid balance to the Republic of Panama after the date of the termination of this Treaty."

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS—EX. N, 95-1

At the request of Mr. Hodges, his name was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 20 and amendment No. 21, intended to be proposed to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, Ex. N, 95-1.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Feb. 23, 1978]

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume the consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, which the clerk will report.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Article I is open to amendment.

The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I do have an amendment to article I. I had not planned to offer it today, although, after discussing the matter with the distinguished majority leader, there are conditions under which I would be willing to offer the amendment. This is amendment No. 40.

What it does is take article I and, by a substitute, knock out all of article I and then, with the substitute, reinstate article I with a proviso. This would be the appropriate place to offer this amendment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator offer the amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir, the Senator does not offer the amendment. I am discussing article I and the relationship of my anticipated amendment to article I and the need for amendment of article I.

Article I, as contained in the Neutrality Treaty, provides as follows:

The Republic of Panama declares that the canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this treaty. The same regime of neutrality shall apply to any other international waterway that may be built either partially or wholly in the territory of the Republic of Panama.

Then, the substitute which I would add to that language, which would be reinstated by my substitute, provides that the military presence of the United States in what was the Panama Canal Zone on September 7, 1977—and I chose that date because that was the date on which the President and the dictator, Torrijos, signed the treaty—shall be continued beyond December 31, 1999, if the President of the United States deems it necessary for the defense of the canal or the maintenance of the neutrality thereof and shall, prior to December 21, 1999, so certify to the Government of Panama. That would be filling a need or supplying a provision to rectify the omission in the so-called leadership amendment.

The leadership amendment, which, as I understand it, will be offered to article IV, and then another one to article VI—together, they constitute what I call and what is usually called the leadership amendment. I might mention parenthetically, to show why the Senate should have reverse order of these treaties, and this point was made by the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. Scott) on yesterday, this article I in the Neutrality Treaty says:

The Republic of Panama declares that the canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral. * * *

Mr. Scott asked, What became of the United States? Are they not also declaring the canal neutral? It illustrates why we should not have gone to the Neutrality Treaty first, because, obviously, the amendment, even though it goes into effect at the same time as the Panama Canal Treaty, is really not effective until the start of the next century, because the Panama Canal Treaty provides that the United States shall provide the major defense for the canal during the rest of this century. So it is clear proof that this Neutrality Treaty really does not become effective until the start of the next century by the very wording of article I:

The Republic of Panama declares that the canal is neutral.

Well, there is no need of saying, "United States," because we are pulled out completely by the year 2000. But the leadership amendment overlooks the fact that, by the year 2000, the United States will have been obligated, under the terms of the Panama Canal Treaty, to pull all of our troops out of Panama by the year 2000, when, in effect—when, as a matter of practical application—the Neutrality Treaty will come into play. So, we have the anomalous situation that we are trying to provide for the defense of the canal and, yet mandate that we get out of the Canal Zone during this century.

All right. We are out of the Canal Zone at the start of the next century. And, yet, the leadership amendment would say that the United States shall have the right to defend the canal and maintain its neutrality, and it gives that right, but deprives us of the means of doing it, because all of our troops will be out. If we ever decide that we want to go back in to defend the canal or to protect our interests there, or to maintain its neutrality, we have to come into Panama as invaders.

We would either have to have an amphibious landing or we would have to land paratroops there. Either action on our part would cause tremendous international reverberations and would certainly not be conducive to peaceful relations between the United States and Panama and Central and South American countries. So the purpose of my amendment to article I would be to put first things first and spell it out right here, in article I.

The proponents of the treaties, in debate yesterday, said:

We cannot consider the Panama Canal Treaty first; we would have to vote against it. We have first to determine the matter of a proper defense of the canal and maintain its neutrality. We have to get that established.

All right, Mr. President, if we are going to establish the guidelines, if we are going to establish the conditions under which we have a right to defend the canal and maintain its neutrality, let us decide it right here in article I.

What does my proposed substitutes do then for the leadership amendment and for our right to defend the canal and protect our national interests?

Mr. President, we do not know what the political conditions in Panama will be starting with the year 2000. They may go from bad to worse down there.

We know that dictator Torrijos came into power in Panama under a coup d'etat. He was not elected. They do not know anything about free election of their public officials down there. He has never been voted in by the people in Panama.

We understand that he is a left-leaning dictator. We know that he has little or no respect for human rights. We know that he has cozied up to dictator Fidel Castro in Cuba. We know that Russia casts covetous looks at the Panama Canal and the Panama Canal Zone.

We do not know who will be in control of Panama at the year 2000. Panama might be a Communist satellite, it might be a Russian satellite, it might be a Cuban satellite. But I think we can safely assume it is not going to be the world's greatest democracy.

Mr. President, the way to assure they are not going to have a democracy in Panama is to agree to these treaties.

Why do I say that?

Panama, under the treaty—and my authority for this is Economic Minister Barletta of Panama—skim off from toll revenues, and other sources, $2.262 billion in the next 22 years.

Obviously, that runs a little over $100 million a year that Panama is to receive. That will support a whole lot of the dictatorial government in Panama. It will be a godsend to dictator Torrijos.

Just think of adding $100 million a year to the revenues of this dictatorial regime. Obviously, it would perpetuate in office Mr. Torrijos and his regime. It would allow him to continue his failure to recognize and observe the human rights of the Panamanian people.

After all, Mr. President, we are supposed to have a national policy of protecting human rights around the world. I applauded the President for his stand and his drive for seeking to get other nations to respect human rights as we do in this country. But if we give a dictator $100 million a year, with no strings attached, what reason is there to believe he is going to change his policy?

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I am delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator from Alabama indicate what the present level of payment from the United States to Panama is? It is true, is it not, it is about $2,300,000 a year, the present level of payment?

Mr. ALLEN. The present annuity?

Mr. LAXALT. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. It is $2,300,000.

I might say at that point to my distinguished colleague, the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt), that I am not particularly disturbed about making a substantial increase in the amount of the annuity we pay Panama.

I would be willing to see a tenfold increase in this amount, provided we continue with the control, the maintenance, and the defense of the canal. If we keep the status quo there, then the dollars and cents of it, up to a reasonable amount, would not bother the Senator from Alabama.

Make it $25 million, but keep the defense of the canal, the maintenance of the canal, and the operation of the canal in American hands. That would be my notion of a proper treaty.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. And it can actually be done without the treaties, of course.

Mr. LAXALT. I think it is important that distinction be drawn, because those of us who oppose the treaties, on the floor here and otherwise, have been placed in the posture of turning our backs on the Panamanians when nothing could be further from the truth.

Mr. ALLEN. That is certainly true.

Mr. LAXALT. It is true our principal concern is protecting a vital, strategic facility for security of this country and the hemisphere.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. That is certainly the truth.

Mr. LAXALT. For the purpose again of the record, what is the present military component that we have in Panama, in very general terms?

Mr. ALLEN. We have 14 military bases there to defend the canal. Under the treaties, as soon as the Panama Canal Treaty is agreed to, we would drop from 14 bases down to 4 bases.

Certainly, that is somewhat at variance, it would seem to me, with the contention that the canal cannot be defended. If it cannot be defended with 14 bases, why would they think it can be defended with 4 bases?

It seems to me that we are already taking out much of our military presence when we reduce the bases from 14 down to 4.

But further than that, by the year 2000, we have to eliminate all of those.

In addition, I say to the distinguished Senator from Nevada, as to these side agreements that they have—and by the way they take up three times as much wordage as do both of the treaties—the distinguished Vice President stated in response to a parliamentary inquiry I propounded that the Senate has no right to amend these side agreements that have been made. Under these side agreements, even though we have 14 bases now and are going to cut it down to four, every 2 years the Government of Panama and the Government of the United States, during the period up to the year 2000, can negotiate and eliminate those four bases prior to the year 2000. They may do that 2 years from now. I do not know.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. LAXALT. Have we been told repeatedly on the Senate floor that the reason why we should support these treaties is to minimize the probability of violence and minimize the possibility of sending American boys down there to defend the canal? Have we been told that repeatedly?

Mr. ALLEN. We have been told that, and that was some of the rhetoric that we heard on national television. But it is my belief and my observation that if we give in at this point, during this 22-year period, with their appetite whetted with this $100 million they are getting down there, they will want an even better deal than that; and they will say, "22 years is too long. Let's renegotiate this, and cut it down to 4, 6, 8, or 10 years."

Mr. LAXALT. Is it not also true that when you are thinking of reducing your military presence, as is contemplated under the canal treaties, from 14 to 3, we are really reducing our effectiveness in defending the canal, thereby increasing our reason for having to send additional troops there in the event it is necessary?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. So it is really counterproductive, is it not?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, it is.

Mr. LAXALT. As the Senator from Alabama has indicated—and that is why many of us are concerned—we do not want to send our boys down there. We have been told by General McAuliffe and others in charge, other military people, that the existing military presence is more than adequate to defend the canal.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, they have stated that.

Mr. LAXALT. Yet, by the terms of these treaties, we are going to jeopardize that situation to the extent of reducing our military presence, thereby increasing the risk that we will have to send additional troops there.

Mr. ALLEN. That is exactly right.

Mr. LAXALT. That does not make much sense, does it?

Mr. ALLEN. It does not to me; I will say that.

Mr. LAXALT. To compound it, as the Senator from Alabama has indicated here, in support of his amendment, for which I commend him, because it is badly needed, the leadership amendment presupposes that all is going to go well with the Panamanians in 2000, does it not?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, it does. Also, of course, it is drafted in the light of the fact that we are going to be completely out of the Panama Canal Zone by the year 2000; and we would have no troops there at all. We would have to bring them in by one method or another.

Mr. LAXALT. Precisely.

I do not know whether the Senator from Alabama was on the floor the other day during the debate I had with Senator Church on this very point—that assuming that we are out of the Canal Zone entirely, which we will be, and assuming there is some kind of difficulty with the Panamanians, whether they are a satellite of the Soviet Union or Castro, or whether they are just in difficulties with us, it is true, as the Senator from Alabama has pointed out, that the only way we can meaningfully protect our rights, as contemplated by the leadership amendment, is to invade that country, is it not?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; that would seem to me to be so. We would have no troops there, and we would have to bring them in.

Mr. LAXALT. We will either have to make an amphibious landing or land paratroops. Is that not so?

Mr. ALLEN. That is the only way I can say it could be done.

Mr. LAXALT. Is it not the opinion of the Senator from Alabama that that scenario increases the risk to the people of this country, to the security of this country, because that necessarily places us in a position of confrontation with the Panamanian Government?

Mr. ALLEN. That is true.

I might also say that another shortcoming of the leadership amendment is that it contains a special provision that would tie our hands if we observed the treaty provisions, and I believe we are a treaty observing nation. That would tie our hands with respect to coming in if the Panamanians, rather than a foreign power, were violating the neutrality of the canal and were failing to live up to their obligation; because the leadership amendment has a paragraph stating that in no event does the right that is given us to come in to defend the canal allow us to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama. Well, if they are there, blocking our access to the canal, it certainly seems to me that we would have to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama, if we are going to gain access to the canal.

They have stuck this little thing in not to protect the interests of the people of the United States but, obviously, at the behest of the Panamanians.

Mr. LAXALT. In the process, we stand a great risk, do we not, of subordinating the interests of the American people to those of the Panamanian people?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

I say to the distinguished Senator from Nevada that the Senate has the constitutional right, obligation, and duty to give advice to the administration, to give its opinion, not just to consent. It is to advise and consent.

So, as I see the battle shaping up—and this is one reason why we made the effort to go to the Panama Canal Treaty—once the leadership amendment, ineffectual as it is to protect the interests of the United States, is agreed to in the Senate, we are going to hear a hue and cry: “Well, now let’s get on and complete these treaties.”

I predict that we are going to see an effort to stonewall—that is, to resist entirely all constructive amendments offered here on the floor; and that would seem to me to be depriving the Senate of its function of advising as well as consenting.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. LAXALT. It has been said repeatedly here on the floor and elsewhere that a rejection of these treaties would be tantamount to a rejection of the President of the United States. Is it not true that under the terms and provisions of the Constitution, the President—this President, all before him, and those in the future—has only the power to negotiate in a matter of this kind?

Mr. ALLEN. That is true. The executive branch, of course, does negotiate treaties. They are sent to the Senate then, for such action on behalf of the people of the country that the Senate might care to take in the way of shaping this treaty.

I might say at this point that I feel that Dictator Torrijos jumped the gun when he called a plebiscite in Panama, because he knew full well that this treaty would have to come to the United States Senate. I think it is something in the nature of arrogance on the part of Dictator Torrijos to go ahead and call the plebiscite in Panama, ram it through down there, even though the U.S. Senate has the constitutional right to seek to revise that treaty.

So apparently he has taken the position, “Well, we’ll get the treaty approved by the people of Panama in a plebiscite, and then we’ll go to the Senate and we’ll say, ‘Don’t change it now. Don’t change it, else it will take another plebiscite down in Panama.’”

Well, what is wrong with another plebiscite? I see nothing wrong with another plebiscite. We should have another plebiscite down there if we amend this treaty in substantial form.

So here the treaty is brought before the U.S. Senate, and they say:

Don't amend it. Don't amend the treaty. If so, Dictator Torrijos might have to have another plebiscite down there.

That is the main argument, as I see it, against this effort. We should not be worried about whether Torrijos has to have another plebiscite or not. We should be concerned with what is in the national interest and let Torrijos take such action as he sees fit.

Some Senators say, "I'm not going to vote for any amendment that would call for another plebiscite in Panama." What sort of attitude is that? Should we not determine what is in the best interests of the people of this country and not let Mr. Torrijos determine what action he wants the U.S. Senate to take?

I might state, too—and this is a great show of arrogance on the part of those making the demands on the Foreign Relations Committee—I do not serve on the Foreign Relations Committee, but as——

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. For a question.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes. Does the Senator think Torrijos in carrying through the plebiscite for approval of the treaties by his people was more arrogant than the Senator from Alabama holding a hearing in June in opposition to the treaties before they were even consummated in August? Which is the more arrogant?

Mr. ALLEN. Before I held them when?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, that is right.

Mr. ALLEN. Held them when?

Mr. HOLLINGS. I just said as to the head of a country carrying through with his plebiscite, the Senator calls that arrogant. If I remember correctly, the Senator was holding hearings in opposition and trying to really wreck the effort of the executive branch and this Government in trying to formulate a treaty in June. Was not the Senator on some Subcommittee for Constitutional Government holding these hearings with admirals coming around and testifying?

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will state his question rather than making a speech, I will be glad to answer it.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I am not going to make a speech. I wonder who was more arrogant. The Senator seems to call that arrogant.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will ever come to the point on the question I shall answer.

Mr. HOLLINGS. My point is arrogant.

Mr. ALLEN. All right.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The Senator from Alabama is talking about arrogance.

Mr. ALLEN. All right.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Here is a country that had a plebiscite that the Senator said was rammed through, but there were observers and all. The Senator mentioned only the President can negotiate a treaty. But before the poor President could get a new treaty as had been agreed to by three previous Presidents, Republican and Democratic, before he could do that in August and have it signed in September, what about the Senator's arrogance in holding hearings—

Mr. ALLEN. Get to the question.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Let me complete the question—in June under some spurious auspices of a Constitutional Government Subcommittee?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLINGS. And bringing in admirals and telling how the country was going to the dogs.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Hollings), and I am glad to see that dictator Torrijos has a staunch defender in the Senate.

Mr. HOLLINGS. No; I am talking about arrogance.

Mr. ALLEN. All right.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I am going to come to that.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Torrijos is totally unpredictable, and I would not know how to defend him.

Mr. ALLEN. I yielded for a question. The Senator now asked his question, and I am going to answer it.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina wants to know whether the Senator from Alabama is perhaps more arrogant than the dictator of Panama, and he cites as evidence of that fact the Senator from Alabama, chairman of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, did hold a hearing, several hearings, for that matter, before which committee some of the greatest legal minds in the country appeared, discussing the constitutional issue involved.

I am certainly glad the distinguished Senator has given me this opportunity to tell what the constitutional issue that is involved is.

The constitutional issue is that the Constitution of the United States, article IV, section 3, paragraph 2, says that the Congress shall dispose of and make all needful regulations with respect to the territory and other property of the United States.

So, the constitutional issue is whether the Senate alone has the power to dispose of property of the United States which the canal, of course, is, and the property in the Panama Canal Zone, whether the Senate by treaty can make that disposition or whether the Constitution is going to be followed, which would require action by the House of Representatives as well as the Senate in the form of a statute providing for the disposition of the property of the United States.

The Senator from Alabama, understanding that the administration had no intention of submitting this matter to the House of Representatives in accordance with the constitutional processes, wanted to establish the constitutional issue involved.

More than 218 House Members have joined in a resolution in the House of Representatives saying, in effect, that the Constitution requires that this issue be submitted not only to the Senate but to the House of Representatives as well in the form of a statute.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. No. I want to answer the Senator's question first before he gets on another one.

Mr. HOLLINGS. That is not the question. I do not question that.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not yielding to the Senator. I hope he will be as courteous to me as I have been to him.

The point involved is as to who is more arrogant, the Senator from Alabama or Dictator Torrijos.

Was it arrogant or was it arrogance on the part of the Senator from Alabama as he saw these treaties approaching and as he felt one of the important issues involved was whether it took action of the Senate and of the House of Representatives—and apparently the administration to this good day say they are not going to submit it to the House of Representatives—was it arrogant of him to try to find out what the Constitution provided on this great issue of separation of powers, the power of the Executive set up against the power of Congress and eliminating one House from consideration? Was it arrogant for the Senator from Alabama to hold this hearing to find out what the constitutional issue involved is and what the answer was?

And I will state to the distinguished Senator that the overwhelming preponderance of legal opinion in this country is that it does require action of Congress to dispose of property of the United States.

So we will leave that to the decision of anyone involved as to who was arrogant in this matter.

But I do say that it was arrogant on the part of dictator Torrijos, this dictator, this person whose regime has no respect for human rights. Knowing full well that the Senate of the United States has the constitutional right to advise and consent to this treaty, and it has a right to amend it in substantial form if it sees fit, was it arrogant of him to ram this treaty through down in Panama without waiting to see what the action of the U.S. Senate would be in this issue?

So that is the point involved. I do not feel it was arrogant of the Senator from Alabama to do his work as chairman of the Committee on Separation of Powers and study this great constitutional issue.

There is no indication to this good day that the administration will submit it to the House of Representatives, even in response to the plea of a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives, and that had to be a bipartisan majority—I guess it could be a Democratic majority only—but certainly the Republicans would have to have the assistance of a large number of Democrats to get 218 names on a resolution over there.

So, the Senator from Alabama makes no apologies for the fact that he did call hearings on this important subject, and the conclusion he reached from these hearings and from this study of this issue is that for a valued transfer of the property of the United States it takes a statute agreed to by both Houses.

The administration apparently feels that it has greater sway here in the U.S. Senate.

(Mrs. Humphrey assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. And I believe the distinguished Senator from South Carolina in the last Congress was one of the Senators who signed the resolution, cosponsored the resolution, which said that, in effect, in no event would they support a Panama Canal Treaty giving the Panama Canal to Panama.

I am sure the Senator will correct me if I have misapprehended the facts in this area.

I believe he joined his distinguished senior colleague, Mr. Thurmond, in this way, but apparently now——

Mr. HOLLINGS. Madam President, will the Senator yield so I may comment?

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Why does the Senator not yield for the answer so I may comment intelligently?

Mr. ALLEN. What is the answer then?

Mr. HOLLINGS. There are two answers to two questions.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The first question that the Senator asked a second ago was with respect to the resolution which said we shall not yield control. I am quite persuaded, now that the Defense Department has included article IV, the right of defense, that we have not lost actual control in the sense of defending it, and we maintain the use. That is one of the big reasons, of course, that I came out here in support of those treaties; but back to the original question.

The Senator from South Carolina does not think that Torrijos was arrogant in calling a plebiscite. The Senator from South Carolina did not think the Senator from Alabama was arrogant in having hearings before his own subcommittee, but the question was the timing.

The Senator said that Torrijos, this dictator, rammed it through before the Senate, and the Senator does not remember history well, because the President of the United States would have liked to have had an October confirmation of these treaties, too, and it was the Senator from South Carolina, the leadership, and many others, who said we have to have thorough hearings and be deliberate about it and understand this thing so that we did not act precipitantly.

But it was not a question of either one being arrogant but certainly if one was arrogant; namely, Torrijos, from a sense of timing in October, some 6 weeks after it was signed, then how could that be characterized as arrogance from a sense of timing and not the Senator's precipitate hearing even before a treaty was signed.

I just could not understand the logic of that.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I do not believe the Senator has answered what I yielded to him for as to whether he was a cosponsor of this resolution in the last Congress saying we were not going to approve the Panama Canal transfer.

Mr. HOLLINGS. No; I was a cosponsor of the resolution, along with Senator John McClellan of Arkansas, that we would not lose control of it.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator was a cosponsor of that resolution?

Mr. HOLLINGS. That is right.

Mr. ALLEN. One of the 37 Senators who cosponsored it?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes; that we wanted the right to defend it.

Mr. ALLEN. Did the Senator go down to Panama to discuss this matter with Dictator Torrijos?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Can I answer that?

Mr. ALLEN. I asked the question.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes; I went to Panama. I would have gone and discussed anything at that particular time, when I headed the Senate committee concerned with the Panama Canal. With dictator Torrijos, I would have discussed it with him, but I received word from him indirectly that he would be pleased to see me as chairman of that group, but he would not be similarly pleased to see Senator Scott. I thought that was out. That was definitely out, and I sent word to him I would not see him if he would not see the entire Senate delegation.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator was down there for the purpose of getting clarification about these treaties?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Oh, yes, sir, there is not any question of that. That is what I was there for.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to hear it. If the Senators went down to Panama to get edification on this subject, and find out more about what is involved, I guess they might have checked with the White House for a copy of the treaties and studied them, possibly. I guess possibly going to Panama might—

Mr. HOLLINGS. Well, we do both.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes; you look at the treaties, you make the trip, you listen to distinguished Senators like yourself who might persuade them—though I doubt it in this particular regard—there are all kinds of ways a Senator makes his judgment.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. Well, I have not been to Panama in some years. I will have to confess that I did, on one occasion, go through the Canal Zone at Government expense, but I happened to be a member of the U.S. Navy, back in 1943, and we were going through the canal moving from the Atlantic theater of action over to the Pacific theater.

I think it is a great engineering achievement. The United States has operated this canal for the benefit of world shipping on a nonprofit basis.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Will the distinguished Senator yield so I can—

Mr. ALLEN. Let me complete my thought. But now we are going to change the whole nature of this operation. We are going to turn it into a profitmaking venture for Panama, if these treaties are passed. That is something I do not think we want to do.

But on the matter of arrogance, I think it is somewhat arrogant for dictator Torrijos to hold court down there as 50 U.S. Senators come down to confer with him. I think that is arrogance as well as it is arrogant to jump the gun on submitting a plebiscite to the people, permitting the question to be decided by plebiscite in Panama, knowing full well that the United States has an opportunity to advise and consent, amend, change, reserve, make reservations, add any number of understandings, and the like. Yet he jumps the gun and has his plebiscite, and now, for some strange reason, he does not want another plebiscite.

And his great influence is being felt here in the halls of the Senate, and I will give a concrete example. After I have done that, I will be delighted to yield to my good friend the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

The leadership amendment that we have been talking about, and that has fallen so far short of the mark of protecting our national interest, was originally planned as a new article or new articles, and I am sure the point is not important whether they have it in the form of a new article or whether they break it into two articles, as they have with the amendments which are before the Senate now.

The Foreign Relations Committee approved the new article approach. They voted in the Foreign Relations Committee—this is not divulging any secret; in fact, it has been in the press and talked about. It has been talked about on the floor here. It was talked about last Monday; the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), who is a member of the committee, talked about it here on the floor of the Senate.

The Foreign Relations Committee put the leadership amendment in the form of new articles or a new article—I am not sure whether it was one article or two—and did not have amendments, but new articles.

Well, the State Department, according to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) on yesterday, I believe, became alarmed over the fact that new articles are being added to the treaty, and they reported to the Foreign Relations Committee, "Wait a minute, that's not the way to handle this. The Panamanians"—it is a one-man government down there, so I guess that would be Mr. Torrijos—"the Panamanians don't like these amendments in the form of a new article or new articles."

The Spanish word for amendment, "enmienda," I believe, does not signify a major change in a treaty, whereas "reforma," which would be the Spanish designation if new articles are added, indicates a major change; and the State Department felt that the Panamanians would not like this. I do not know why State Department representatives relied on this information. We do not know whether the Panamanians protested to the State Department, or whether the State Department acting on its own initiative, knowing the Panamanians would object, told the Foreign Relations Committee, "Set this thing right; we can't accept it this way."

So the Foreign Relations Committee, after having acted in this area and approved a new article, backed up. They backed up, reconsidered that vote, and went by the form of amendments to two articles, rather than a brand new article.

That proves, Madam President, the fact that the Panamanian dictator has tremendous influence here in the U.S. Senate in shaping the wording of these treaties.

I do not like that. I do not like the fact that it seems to be the attitude of many proponents of the treaties that no substantial amendments, other than the leadership amendments, are going to be accepted here in the U.S. Senate unless Mr. Torrijos gives his advice and consent.

I do not read that in the Constitution. The Constitution says the U.S. Senate shall give its advice and consent, but from a practical point of view Mr. Torrijos is going to say yea or nay on the amendments that the U.S. Senate should consider. Watch and see if the Senator from Alabama is correct.

I was talking to a major Senate proponent of the treaties just yesterday. I asked him, and I called him by his first name, "Would you not support a constructive, substantive amendment to these treaties?"

His answer was, and it was a great surprise to me, "I will not support any amendment that will cause another plebiscite to be held in Panama."

Why should that be the attitude of the U.S. Senate? Why should we say, a majority of us, if it is not satisfactory with Mr. Torrijos we cannot accept it here in the Senate?

There are numerous constructive amendments which are going to be brought before the Senate. The first day we had this matter up I conceded there would be dozens of amendments, and I feel there will be because this is a very complex issue. It took the executive branch of Government 13 years to negotiate this treaty with all of its ramifications.

Well, we have a big task ahead of us here in the Senate. I believe we can do it in less than 13 years. I believe we can. It is going to take some time. We are going to see that these amendments are considered by the Senate, and if they have merit, if they protect the interests of the people of the United States, should they not be adopted, whether Mr. Torrijos agrees or not?

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator has indicated that there was a 13-year period for negotiations. Does the Senator have any information as to whether the treaties which have previously been in negotiation over the past 13 years bear any real resemblance to the current treaties? Is it not true that the treaties under negotiation in that period of time were substantially dissimilar to the treaties now presented to the U.S. Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I am not advised just what the differences were. In one area, and this is stated in the Armed Services Committee report, they had actually agreed on a stronger defense provision than they ended up with. They actually agreed to it. Secretary Clements commented upon it. Yet the negotiators said that was not necessary.

Also, right at that point, Ambassador Linowitz, one of the negotiators, was never confirmed by the U.S. Senate. His name was never presented to the Senate. He was appointed under some sort of provision which allowed him to serve for 6 months. It is my understanding that substantial changes were made in the treaty in the last couple of days that Mr. Linowitz had the authority to act.

Yes, there were substantial changes in the treaties in the last few days.

If these changes needed to be made right at the last minute, would it not be entirely appropriate for the U.S. Senate to seek to make changes in these treaties? I do not believe there is any proof that this complex treaty—or these complex treaties—is the last word in a proper treaty. Is the U.S. Senate to abdicate its role of advising and consent?

After about 20 of these amendments have been turned down by the Senate, it is going to give considerable credence to the statement I made that an effort is going to be made to kill all substantive amendments. When that takes place, I think the people of the country will recognize that the final arbiter of the wording of this treaty is not the membership of the U.S. Senate or the large majority of the U.S. Senate, but it is Mr. Torrijos. He will decide whether any amendments are added to this treaty.

Back in 1940, I believe it was, when President Roosevelt was reluctantly accepting a third term as President at the convention—he did not attend the convention but he had people there who represented his interest, and, of course, set up the draft for him—when a problem would come up, and they wanted to ask President Roosevelt about it, he would say, "Clear it with Sidney Hillman," who at that time, I believe, was the strongest labor leader in the country. He said, "Clear it with Sidney."

It looks to me like the U.S. Senate is getting the attitude of saying, as amendments are being discussed and brought before the Senate, "Clear it with Omar Torrijos."

I do not believe that is the attitude that Members of the Senate want to have, that we have to clear our actions with Mr. Torrijos.

I know there are 65 or 68 Senators pledged to support these treaties, but I am hopeful that on issues involving the security of the United States, on issues involving the defense of the canal, Senators will use some independent thinking. As I say, fulfill your pledge to the administration to support the treaties on the final vote on the resolution of ratification, but use a little independence in considering these amendments. If they are constructive, if they add to the security of the United States, let us agree to them. Let us let Mr. Torrijos get them approved down in Panama the best way he can. But, when the treaty leaves the U.S. Senate and goes to the President, let us see to it that it is the best treaty we can turn out from the standpoint of protecting the security interests of the people of the United States. That is all I ask.

I am going to be somewhat suspicious of the steamroller in the Senate if amendment after amendment is knocked down because, in the final analysis, let us face it, Mr. Torrijos says, "I cannot accept that amendment because that would require a new plebiscite."

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Madam President, when the Senator yields the floor, I should like to be recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad the Senator is ready to talk. I shall be through in 15 or 20 minutes if he will just have a seat and wait. I will yield the floor to him after a bit.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Very good. The steamroller cannot even get up any steam.

Mr. ALLEN. There may be steam on the side of the opponents.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I would like to get it rolling, but I cannot get the floor. I have been waiting for 2 weeks, but the distinguished Senator from Alabama has had the floor. I have not been able to get 5 minutes, but he has had 5 hours.

Mr. ALLEN. I have more complaints about it than the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I do not know about complaints, but I would like to satisfy the Senator if I could get the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall be through in 15 or 20 minutes.

I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. Madam President, the Senator from Alabama has spoken of a steamroller, which would indicate that perhaps the battle on the treaty is lost. The Senator does not subscribe to that theory does he?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I have said there are some 65 to 68 who are pledged on this matter. That is my considered judgment. But there is a good possibility that some of those can be retrieved.

Mr. LAXALT. Because of the amendment procedure.

Mr. ALLEN. They will recognize that it is not in the best interests of the United States and will agree to some constructive amendments. I do not want to discuss my amendment before the lapse of the time that I have suggested I would use.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. By the way, Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that when I do offer this amendment, other Senators who care to become cosponsors of the amendment be allowed to add their names ab initio to the amendment, that it appears as introduced by all whose names appear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. That would be confined to the time that I introduce it, of course.

Madam President, this amendment that I hope to offer, either sometime this week or early next week, adds to the security of the United States in the defense of the canal. That is its sole purpose. There is no deviousness to the matter. It is contained in six or eight lines, but it fills a great omission in the leadership amendment. I say that because, under the leadership amendment in the Panama Canal Treaty, all of our troops have to be out of the Panama Canal Zone, and Panama, for that matter, by December 31, 1999. Then, let us say this neutrality starts right now, but it does not have a great field of operation until the start of the next century, because, under the Panama Canal Treaty, the United States has the defense of the canal for the rest of this century. But, when the Neutrality Treaty that we are working on now comes into play at the start of the next century, under the treaties all of our troops will be out of Panama. We have this great right under the Neutrality Treaty and the leadership amendment, with no troops in Panama, not a one, and the leadership amendment gives us the great right to defend the neutrality of the canal. Well, we snatch away from the country the means to defend the canal and then say, we have the right to defend it—defend it without a single member of the Armed Forces in Panama.

How are we going to defend it? Well, we will defend it by following the route of the leadership amendment that says we have a right to intervene in order to defend the canal and protect its neutrality, but we must not interfere with the internal affairs of Panama in so doing.

That is in the leadership amendment. That is not my suggestion: Do not interfere with that. That is in the leadership amendment. Defend it, but we do not have a single troop there. Defend it, but do not interfere with Panama's Government.

How are we going to defend it, under those circumstances? Well, we are going to drop some paratroops there, or we are going to have to have an amphibious landing. If somebody can think of any other way to defend a canal, with no troops there, I would like to know how it can be done.

Now, in this amendment, which I am going to offer at the appropriate time, this one little added security measure is added to this concept of all the troops being withdrawn and then having the right to defend it. This adds one little phrase, that the military presence of the United States shall be continued beyond December 31, 1999, if the President of the United States deems it is necessary to do so to defend the canal or to protect its neutrality, and he so certifies to the Government of Panama prior to December 31, 1999.

Now, what could be wrong with that? That does not say that the President is going to opt to do that, but if it is necessary, to defend the canal, to keep some troops there beyond December 31, 1999, why should we not provide for that contingency? Not to accept that amendment would leave a great big hole that you could march an army through, because it does not cover the contingency of troops being needed, the physical presence of troops being needed to defend the canal 22 years from now.

It is a very risky proposition, Madam President, to say that we know what the conditions are going to be down there, that we know the conditions are going to be such that we can withdraw all of our troops.

That is what we are saying, that is what the leadership amendment implies—we know that everything is going to be perfect down there and we will withdraw our troops, but they are going to let us come back in if we force our way back in.

Mr. Castro may control Panama by that time, but we are obligated under the treaties that are written to pull out all of our troops before the start of the next century and then rest on our right to force our way back in.

I believe, in all sincerity, that this amendment would add to the security of the United States. It would add to our ability to defend the canal and the leadership says that is the only area we need to change. They are not worried about the cost to the taxpayer, not going to put any changes there, apparently, just change the right to defend.

But their amendment does not cover every contingency, that is the point. It falls short.

Another provision in the leadership amendment that they set great store by is that in an emergency our warships can go to the head of the line. But the amendment neglected to say who is going to say whether there is an emergency.

A little later on, I am going to seek to add a sentence there that the United States shall be the sole judge of whether an emergency exists.

Panama might say, "Well, we've got the canal here. We own it. We operate it. We skim off $100 million a year from it and we don't see any emergency. You can wait your turn. We don't see a bit of emergency."

What can we do? No emergency there. No way to determine what is an emergency. And who makes that decision?

That is another defect in the leadership amendment. Plus the fact that it said we cannot interfere with the internal affairs of Panama, and Panama might be the one, under Torrijos or under Castro or under the Russians, might be the one forbidding us transit through the canal, and we cannot do anything to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama under the leadership amendment.

All I am urging the Senate to do is to consider these matters, consider whether they are in the best interest of the people of the United States.

Let us not decide these questions on whether or not Mr. Torrijos thinks that these are good amendments or whether he thinks that, whether good or not, they would call for another plebiscite.

If the people of Panama are not behind the amendment, if they are not behind the treaties as amended, we do not have much public interest down there, just continue to be harrassed there in Panama in the operation of the Panama Canal.

So I think it would be only right, in the final decision, after the Senate approves these treaties, if it does, for a new plebiscite to be held. That being true, why not draft the treaty along the lines of what is best for the people of the United States? And that will be the amendment I offer.

Other Senators might wish to offer amendments now or at a later time, but since we are on article I, and only article I can be amended at this time under the rules of the Senate in handling treaties, I do plan to offer this amendment. I think it ought to be offered right at the start, to say, "Yes, we're going to add a measure there to help protect the security of the United States, to help us defend the canal."

So that is the amendment that the Senator from Alabama will offer at the appropriate time.

Now, Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. Hollings addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Hollings) is recognized.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Madam President, I only have a few moments. At a little after 12 I have to try to make another appointment. But I will try to get into some of the questions raised by my distinguished friend from Alabama.

We have been indulgent—a better word, perhaps, is respectful—of the Senator from Alabama, recognizing his capability of once getting wrought up being able to wreck a process, and in the U.S. Senate we do not want to "wrought" him up, and I do not think he should be.

He has been my friend and I have tremendous respect for him. But I find that under the rule now, unwritten, that we sort of just let him alone and let him talk himself out, and a lot of things go unchallenged.

To get specific, when the Senator was on his feet, he questioned the idea of visitation. He questioned that idea of visiting Panama. He said, "What you ought to do, Senator, is read the treaty. You don't have to go down there if you want to make up your mind about the contents, and the interest, and whether the United States is protected sufficiently. A visit is not in order. What is really in order is to sit and read the treaties."

Now, that is what we have to do. That is a very intelligent approach, before we take a position, we ought to read what we are taking a position on.

Of course, the distinguished Senator from Alabama did not do that with his hearings. He did not wait for a written treaty.

The Senator from Alabama, long before the treaties could be raised, was objecting, and that was his privilege. That was his privilege, under the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers to raise certain questions and start his objecting to a document that had yet to be drawn.

So do not criticize others who were trying not only to read the document, but go see the parties and the country and learn something about a people. One of the most significant things in the entire treaty ratification process is an understanding of the country we have built, as well as the canal we have built.

Now, in July, and I think it was July 15 of this past year, the U.S. Senate, Madam President, passed a resolution unanimously, Senate Resolution 221, on July 15, directing the appointment of Senators to visit certain countries, including Panama and South America, to study the economic and security interests of this Nation in Panama and in those other countries.

Now, why criticize me for making a trip when the Senate directs me to go?

The Senator is on the floor all the time, and I am sure that that never would have passed if he really objected to it. So I went, not willy-nilly and wandering for a place to flit around and land upon; but, on the contrary, at the solemn direction of the U.S. Senate, with a bipartisan group which, incidentally, included the counsel for the Latin American Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, our distinguished Secretary of the Senate, and the Secretary to the minority, and it was a very educational procedure. So that is why we went.

As I go down the list of things that he brings up, Madam President, I am reminded of the old saying, "A problem for every solution."

Let us go back to when I was trying to fathom the right and the wrong and making initial impressions. In 1967, when I was a member of the Commerce Committee, former Secretary Anderson, chairman of the negotiation team, came to present at that time a proposed treaty that did not include the rights of defense.

The Senator asks, "Was not the treaty today substantially changed and everything else?" Not really—with respect to defense, except what the Joint Chiefs of Staff wrote—article IV. With respect to military occupation by troops, at that particular time it was that we leave after the year 2004; and after negotiating for some 11 to 12 more years, we lost 3 years.

Some who want to continue to negotiate wonder where the trend is and how the United States is faring. Let it be recorded that we lost 3 good years there. Would it not be grant to sit here and let things stay as they are and just do not do anything, if we had that luxury?

It is bunkology that you have to come on the floor and listen to Senators play games. It reminds me of back in the sixties, during the war in Vietnam. You would walk up on the floor, and there was one backing up a battle. Another one was bombing. Another one was calling them murderers. Another one was saying, "Don't do it"; another was saying, "Do it." Another said, "More troops." Another said, "No, get out."

Those were all scenarios in Vietnam, and now we have all the scenarios after the year 2000, with total disregard.

I am confident that the Senator from Alabama and many in opposition have no idea of the problem in Panama today, no idea of the complexity of the issues involved. The way they talk and try to reduce it down misses the complexity involved.

I guess he wants to make Franklin D. Roosevelt a dictator talking about Sidney Hillman. He said, "Check it with Sidney," and now, "Check it with Torrijos." Well, nothing could be more ridiculous or further from the truth.

It is a complex problem, Madam President.

I will never forget the other night, when Eric Sevareid was retiring. He said, after 40 years at CBS, that when he started, there were all black and white, moralistic questions—the Depression and World War II and McCarthyism—and simple answers could be given. He said that is the one thing that impresses him most after 40 years, that there are no simple answers any more.

And this treaty is not a simple, thou shalt bam, bam, bam—all your rights are spelled out and everything just done exactly right. It explains it in some measure after 13 years and getting the best we could in fairness to the United States, the best we could in fairness to the Republic of Panama. We will go into that when we have time, into the history of it.

People are worrying about what they are going to do in Panama. Read the historical record. Talk to David McCullough, or any historian. It was the United States that breached every one of the agreements and understandings and treaties for the last 70 years. We are almost like the Soviets. I like to get on this floor and tell about, "Why have another agreement with the Soviets, because they never obey them?" If I were a Panamanian, I would have a talk here: "Why have an agreement with the United States?" Because we never keep it.

I could go down the record of history as to who did the violating, but we do not have a chance for that, because we have to tell this nonsense and everything is peaceful and happy and we have no problem down there.

With my limited time, let me simply state, Madam President, that I had the opportunity the other evening to debate former brigade commander Maj. Gen. George Mabry before the American Legion in my State. He is a Medal-of-Honor winner; and if we start another war, I want him to be my commander. He sees things as a commander should see them: forward march; to the rear, march; fire; cease fire. It is a life they are leading, and they learn, and I respect.

I am serving now on the board of the Air Force Academy. I have served at West Point. I am a graduate of military schools, and I think we should have more discipline in society, and more in the Senate. But that is not our option.

They start with this limbo of gag, which is not only nonsense, but insulting. Then they go to the constitutionality argument. The President did not have constitutional authority to get a treaty. Whoever heard of that? They were starting the hearings and bringing petitions, and some of them believed that, and they went all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court and stopped the Senate. We could not even ratify.

They went from that to Sol Linowitz, that scenario back in again, that he was not even confirmed. The man was not confirmed. What kind of damn juvenile approach is that?

Everyone knows of the entire death of that little country. And you call him a dictator. A squad leader. They do not have an army as good as the South Carolina National Guard. We have more men in the South Carolina National Guard, and better equipped. Bunk. I am tired of listening to it.

It is a little country we built down there. But they went down there. And they said, "Linowitz"—$1½ billion total debt, $355 million debt of the banks; and all of a sudden we were going to get a treaty just to get the banks out of trouble down there.

Then we went to the sea level argument. I remember when the Senator from Alabama was here saying:

Wait a minute. Why agree to this Article XII, section 2(b), where we sign off and say we are not going to negotiate anywhere? Look at what they got. They got us; they got us.

He forgot his long history, because when William Jennings Bryan was the Secretary of State under Woodrow Wilson—he broke with Wilson later over World War I—he fashioned rights in perpetuity for us with the country of Nicaragua in the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty, and it held fast until the year 1971.

Now, what happened? We have been having troubles in Panama, and there is evidence after occasion, after riot, after sailor killed, soldier killed, American killed, right on up the line to the election day of Jimmy Carter, 1976, where they bombed in the Canal Zone. What is going to happen afterward? What happened before? What will happen afterward is more of what happened before. Everyone with commonsense knows that.

It is not blackmail. We have to have some judgment in these things.

So it was that when we filed that voluminous Interoceanic Canal Commission report by Milton Eisenhower, Bob Anderson, and all the rest, 5 years and $22 million, and went all through the Colombia scenario, the Nicaragua, the Costa Rica, everything else as formulated on page 69, they said that the only feasible routes were Route 10 and Route 14 in the Republic of Panama.

But our good Commander in Chief and President—he is a pretty good negotiator; he is the President. He came from Plains, and he beat all the rest of the crowd in the U.S. Senate, and he has been working at it, for the interests of this country. He said, "I don't want to make this treaty and then have some other country build a sea-level route through where we found was the only feasible place."

Torrijos said, "Fine I sign off on that. You don't go anywhere else."

Nicaragua by that time had found that even the rights in perpetuity were giving them trouble down there.

Travel to some of these countries, I say to the Senator. Learn the feelings of the people. They did not even like the rights. When we found we did not want it, then they brought the treaty up for rescission.

Ah, does not the Senator from South Carolina have some pleasures? February 17, the roll was called up yonder: Aiken, Allen. Aha, rescind those treaties—66 to 5. Who rescinded it? And now they talk this last summer and fall about the sea level. The distinguished Senator from Alabama is the one who rescinded it. They forget the history.

We are not granted the luxury of doing nothing.

When Carter walked down that main street, Pennsylvania Avenue, on Inaugural Day, the next day he met with some 11 Latin American Presidents. They said, "Look, Mr. President, President Johnson promised us but didn't deliver. He was all involved in the war in Vietnam. President Nixon, he got involved. President Ford spent 2 years trying to bring integrity back to government. Now you have a good 4-year administration. Vietnam, Watergate, all excuses are behind. We want to see right done as we voted for what friends we have and what is best interest."

We could not find a single friend on March 23, 1973. On that particular date the United Nations Security Council voted just that, to return the sovereignty of the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama. And we wonder what will happen with all these monkey-shine scenarios.

So they came, and President Carter brought in the Pentagon and Defense chiefs, in a very commendable fashion, I thought, because he talked about misgivings, just as the Senator from South Carolina. We do not want to give up and give away. I am part of that syndrome. I am not part of that "stepping down" in everything. So what I am doing in voting ratification with these amendments on defense, I say to the Senator from Alabama, is not withdrawing from rights but advancing interests—advancing the interests of the United States.

I firmly believe that with all the misgivings and all the changes I could make and the Senator could make, that this is on balance a very, very good thing and a wonderful opportunity, and I hope it pans out, I might end up with egg on my face. Torrijos is unpredictable. I think we can change a bad neighbor into a good neighbor. I think we can act as mature people and do away with colonialism, the last vestige of extraterritorial rights.

But let us not lose the point about the problem because all of those who said we were gagged went right on down. Incidentally, they changed. They were on drugs yesterday. I do not hear anything about drugs today. They got through that. And then the gentleman said, "Oh, we didn't hold that to change any votes; we just wanted the facts."

That is really misleading the American public. Those facts were available to every Senator in the Intelligence Committee when I first heard about it last September, and all reports were filed right there, and some of the new ones brought up, that have now been in the news, operation something like limp time, or march time, or something else of that kind, the Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church), the distinguished former chairman of the Intelligence Committee said that is publicly filed. They went away from brothers and tried to bring in Castro, and they will bring in now this morning Torrijos telling you have to sign off with Torrijos.

I did not see the gentleman down there. I did think it was an arrogant thing to suggest that I should see him but not the distinguished Senator from Virginia. So I do not defend Torrijos.

I am looking at the Republic, and I am looking at the people, and I am looking through the eyes of those who served, four-star commanders. Ask everyone, whether it is General Wilson, General Underwood, General O'Meara, General Porter, right on down the line. Not gagged. The idea that anybody in public life or the present-day military is dishonest, I resent. I resent the idea.

I saw Adm. Jim Holloway, who was born in Charleston, S.C., standing down there for the big aircraft carrier, and some of the other things. They are not gagged.

We are getting records right now in committees different from the administration and OMB budget with regard to our defenses in the country, I say to the Senator, and he knows and I know it. We work that way.

General Underwood issued just a few weeks ago an article in Retired Officer, February 1978, and incidentally he is not all sold. He calls it, "The Panama Canal Treaty, a Mixed Bag." And I want to quote the conclusion of the article, because I read through very thoroughly and he covers the problem as it appears; namely, a confused problem:

Once a way is found to incorporate the words or at least the sense of the Carter press statement into the treaty documentation or into the text of the treaty itself, it can become a document of great value, certainly worthy of support.

That is generally his conclusion. But how does he reach it? All of my constituency thinks there is nobody here but us chickens. It is just like that cartoon in the New Yorker about:

I never heard of the Panama Canal for 30 years. I never even heard of it. And now I finally can't even live without it.

They have not studied it. They have not gotten a feel for the people. They do not know that Eisenhower, who had been 3 years in that Canal Zone, started that riot in 1964 because he had been there 3 years. He made a treaty and, incidentally, we violated it for not only upping the fees, but he made a treaty that you would have equal employment. Everybody is talking about equal employment. A Republican President did that. He said you could raise the Panamanian flag wherever the American flag was raised, and that is what the children were trying to do.

They talk of communism, and I had a delightful time because I had been in riots and civil disturbances for 4 years. I started with the Marions, Berrigans, wait-ins, sit-ins, and any that you want to mention. They started in Rock Hill, S.C. That is the first march that our distinguished—and I have most respect for him, and I agree on the holiday that our cities voted, and the city of Charleston where I lived—Martin Luther King Day—that we have learned a lot from his leadership, but at that time I was trying to keep the peace and I pulled off the ragged city policemen and put black policemen all around and as a result, when there were arrests made there was not the TV result and they went on to Montgomery and, Bull Connor, gave them what they were looking for. It actually started in Rock Hill, S.C. I had 4 years of it with not a single life lost and not a person with serious injury. And there were not any Communists.

This gentleman I was debating thinks every disturbance like 1964 in Panama was communism.

Then he explained how one could not physically get into the country later on in the debate, but he said certainly colonialism is not the problem.

So now I quote General Underwood, his commander:

Most Panamanians have felt for years that this treaty is unfair to them, disregards their sovereign rights, and urgently needs modernization to reflect today's world rather than the colonial practices that were fashionable 74 years ago.

Going on further, under the limits of time here:

My own position in capsule form, is that the status quo is an unacceptable course of action; * * *

That status quo is what the opposition wants, and when we try to show some judgmental capacity, they say, "Well, we can give them a little more money or do a little bit of this. Oh, yes, we believe in revising treaties and everything else."

But:

My own position in capsule form is that the status quo is an unacceptable course of action; that a new treaty is needed to purify what Panama and much of the world see is outdated colonialist role of the United States; * * *

Madam President, let me read one little paragraph that ought to be brought to the attention of every Senator, and I will have to read it again when we get better attendance on the floor because it points out the problem that they do not think we have, and I quote General Underwood:

The point here is that no collection of legalisms—

No collection of legalisms, I say to the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Vermont and other Senators around—

* * * No collection of legalisms, no expert reading of history to the contrary, no citing of the benefits—

That is another flare they bring up:

* * * No citing of the benefits bestowed upon Panama by our building, operating and defending the canal will ever convince the typical Panamanian that his country's sovereignty has not been violated by our occupation of the Canal Zone and our independent operation of the canal. It makes no difference which side has the best arguments or which side has the cleanest interpretation of history. Panama happens to believe it has been wronged and will persist in that belief to the bitter end.

This is, I interject, Madam President, this is the root cause of the high tension between Panama and the United States:

This is a festering sore that poisons our relations. That is why I would tell visitors who asked for my appraisal of the situation confronting the Southern Command at Panama, "We are walking on eggshells and trying to be light-footed about it."

Now, where are the opposition with all those scenarios? They worry about what is going to happen 20 years from now. I am concerned about what is going to happen in 20 days, what is going to happen in 20 weeks, in 20 months.

I asked about a country like Colombia, when my distinguished colleague from Virginia and I were there. I asked what would happen if the treaties were rejected. We were told, "They would try to take advantage of it. Turn the treaty down, and there would be violence and bombings." Senator Scott said, "How long would that go on?" They said, "That would go on just as long as the President here allows it, and politically he would have to allow it to go on for several days, perhaps weeks."

It is a sad situation that we come to where a good sized part of our Senators, Members of this body, some in a political vein—and I commend the distinguished minority leader for not joining that; I commend the distinguished former President Gerald Ford, because I really believe if we ratify this treaty we are going to have to attribute a lot to his strong feel of what is in the best interest of this country; but some, just in a political vein, are using the inflammatory language about "ramming the treaties through in a plebiscite," and "What about Omar? Check it with Omar."

That is silly talk. We are here together, trying to make the best we can out of a situation where, as General Underwood says, we are walking on eggs. We do have a problem that they do not want to recognize, and they all think it is a class 1 contract in freshman law, trying to find what the contract means, and where are the ends and bits, and everything else.

I was rather amused about the investigations of the past habits of people, where the Senator from Louisiana admonished us. He said, "Lord, I have been through that." He said, "You can go ahead and study for years on end, through the FBI, CIA, the Attorney General and Justice Department files, and have a merry chase, study for 2 years, and perhaps conclude that you would not join in any kind of treaty or otherwise. But then a year and a half or 2 years would have passed, and we are looking at ourselves."

We could care less about Torrijos, because, as I have said before, he is totally unpredictable. We do care about our interests in the Republic of Panama. We do care about our defense interests, about being naked.

Incidentally, that point should be clearly understood. Why would the commanders of the military all come up and talk in terms of enhancing our defenses? You would think that we were going up there walking away, and had no defenses. I will never forget talking with General Rogers, the Chief of Staff of the Army, one evening. I said, "General, my colleague and other opponents of the treaty say you can't speak for yourselves."

He said, "Oh, no, we all have our inputs, but once a decision is made we support that decision. The difference here," he said, "is as chiefs, we are advocates; we volunteer to go out and make talks and advocate the ratification of these treaties." He said, "We don't have to do that."

Gen. George Brown:

I think to describe the United States, with this action, as proof that the United States is a paper tiger is absolutely wrong. I think rather it shows the United States to be determined to live in the world of today, not in the world of yesterday. I think it shows we profited by the experience of the Portuguese in Angola and Mozambique, the French in Algeria and Indochina, and ourselves in the Philippines. We left the Philippines for the same reasons that I think we should negotiate these treaties. It is in recognition of the importance of the Panama Canal that I feel we should do this, because we would then be guaranteeing, I think, a better opportunity and guaranteed in the future of the use of the canal.

A better guarantee.

Gen. Bernard Rogers, Chief of Staff of the Army:

I can certainly defend the canal much better—

This is a comparison—

much better under the new treaty than under the present one.

Adm. Robert Long, Vice Chief of Naval Operations:

We think these treaties will enhance—

I emphasize the word “enhance”— the probability of our maintaining the use of the canal.

Gen. Louis Wilson also:

I support the President in seeking the new treaty.

Lt. Gen. Dennis B. McAuliffe, zone commander, the soldier immediately responsible for maintaining the security of the United States there:

Our capability to keep the canal open will be enhanced, considerably enhanced, by the provisions of the treaty.

Therein, Mr. President, is the whole thing. What would we do under the present treaty? They all worry about the year 2000. I hear talk amongst the colleagues; they think that we do not have many veterans among us now. They say, “Oh, we have got so many, 45 Members of the House of Representatives,” Senator from California, “who never served in the military.” And the legion was in town on last evening, and you hear that undercurrent of feeling and apprehension, that before long we are not going to be able to get the votes to defend our country and commit this country, and everything else of that kind.

I worry some about that, too, but I worry more about the present. What would we do under this present treaty to put down an uprising in the next day or two. What would we do? We would have to occupy it. Everyone on this floor agrees with that. We would move in more soldiers; there would be civil unrest, there would be little incidents, a demonstration here, a handgrenade there, and they would bring in, on the 7 o'clock news, two or three bodies with flags around them. Then there would be somebody blow up a steamer. You cannot prevent sabotage, Mr. President, I live in a seaport town. If you think you can protect a vessel, where they are bringing in drugs and contraband, you are fooling yourself. Everybody knows these canal locks are subject to sabotage, and it cannot be prevented except as it has been prevented, by a friendly population and an understanding people, a people with an interest.

Here, under the new treaties, we vest the Panamanians with a vested interest in what they have been fighting for, their own nationalism, their right to determination of their own self destiny. Now we want to give them that through the new treaties, and the other crowd says, “What? What about the new treaties? What will happen when we give them that? What about the cost?”

Three weeks ago the United Nations Economic Commission said we made $12 billion in saved costs, economically, for the United States. So give them a billion. We left $5 billion, I think, when we pulled out of Saigon, in one day. I do not know how many billion in total it cost us, and 56,000 lives over a 12-year period, but at least $5 billion that 1 day. What if it does add up to a billion bucks?

The Secretary of the Navy said, in 1976, that $200 million was saved in his budget as a result of having that canal there.

There are untold benefits that the Panamanians have enjoyed and that the United States has enjoyed. But when it comes down to costs, when we are sitting around here, voting up next year's appropriations, and we hear we have been subsidizing them $8 million for the previous 7 years, why worry now about the cost?

I am worried about the cost to us as a people, because what could we do, Senator from Alabama, under that present treaty? We would have to turn a friendly people into a hostile people. We would have to turn a commercial operation—really, I would like to go into some of these things; that is why I went there to visit. Going on down to the Navy there, I think there are about 600 communications personnel, the highest one of them holding the rank of captain. A line of communications, not of negotiation. And this is all offshore. This does not affect the ratification of these new treaties. We have got our defenses there.

We have our defenses there. We are not being taken there. They are not coming to the canal.

We have our Air Force, and I hope the Air Force around the canal is not fiddling around at Howard Field. I hope they are in Florida and Charleston, S.C. We will alert them long before they get to the canal. If we do not, then this country is in sad shape. About defending the canal? We will defend it from fields in Alabama, South Carolina, and Florida. We are going to defend that canal. Do not worry about it.

There is no navy. There is not a naval vessel down there, other than offshore gunboats, things to fish from, things like that. But there is the Air Force.

Let us go back to the present treaty. Now we have met, we have done what the Senator from Alabama has asked. We have refused to ratify, and they all are going to come up with all kinds of aid programs. I can see it now. We ought to give them a little more money, a little more handout.

Talk about arrogance. It was the Senator from Alabama who used that terminology, not the Senator from South Carolina, who injected the word "arrogance." I think that is arrogance, giving them a little more handout.

Then in the fifties and sixties, I remember one colleague who still serves said, "Now they have a refrigerator, a stove. Some of them want automobiles. What else do the blacks want?"

Arrogance?

Turn the treaties down and then come up with the aid programs, how they ought to get a better deal down there, and everything else, and then wonder why we have had to occupy a friendly country, why we cannot get a single country in the entire 151 nations of the United Nations to vote on our side, as the Senator from New York said.

They have proven that before the National Security Council. It is as if we have the options to fiddle around to the year 2000.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLINGS. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I would like to rise not to interrupt an extraordinarily important statement, but to say that I shall be speaking later in the day precisely to the point about the United Nations and to say that it is exactly as the Senator has described it. This treaty, far from being a retreat in American policy, has the potential to be come an extraordinary forward movement in our relations with the rest of the world. In the space of 10 years' time we may well reverse completely the understanding in the United Nations, for example, of what the United States stands for and what Cuba stands for.

A decade ago Cuba said it stood for resistance to imperialism, for resistance to militarism, for all those wonderful things. We were said to stand for armies, for occupation of other people's lands. But pass this treaty and we will be the people of the future, while the Cubans, murdering and killing and burning their way through Africa, will be the discredited militant imperialists, which in fact they are, and they will be completely rejected in Latin America. The turning point will be this treaty.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The distinguished Senator from New York has a grasp of the situation and certainly a better capability to articulate.

I visited South America as a Governor in 1960. We were on the tail end of an operation PanAmerican, under John Eisenhower, and then John Kennedy has his operation which I cannot pronounce. It is in Spanish. Will the Senator from New York help his colleague?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator will think it is the Alianza para El Progreso. It had a particular difficulty in Spanish because it can be translated equally as the alliance for or the alliance against progress.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Well, now, some 17 years later, it looks like an alliance against progress.

After World War II, where did we go? They had done everything. They had furnished supplies, they had helped us with the canal, they had helped us with the raw materials. Latin America made a tremendous sacrifice for freedom along with the United States, hand in glove.

Then what did we do? We said we had to go to Japan to rebuild; we had to go to Germany and rebuild. What did we do down under? Absolutely nothing.

We started to penalize them because of the depression. The gold and the silver money demeaned their dignity in the way they paid. They still had to use separate water fountains and everything else.

Here we were with the Marshall Plan and all, which we are all very proud of. What did we do down under? We turned it around the other way and had a bad neighbor policy.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator agree in recalling that the largest country in Latin America, Brazil, one of the largest countries in the world, joined us in the war against the Fascists, and the Nazis, and sent troops to Europe?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, and one of their generals served under Gen. Mark Clark, of the 3d Army, in Italy. That general and others reminded me of that when I was in Brazil. Gen. Mark Clark, the Army commander, who now lives in Charleston, is one of our most noted soldiers.

Mr. President, I have gone over my time slightly. The Senator from California has been waiting. I think I will yield at this moment and then come back and complete my thoughts. I yield the floor at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, as I look back at the early stages of the public debate on the Panama treaties, it seems to me that I was among the first public figures who became actively involved in this issue. My remark, "We stole it fair and square—we should keep it," was good for a laugh and it made headlines. It was a witticism and generally understood as such. During the campaign it was, of course, not possible to go into the subject in depth. But I always made it clear that our policies toward Panama had to be examined in the general framework of our relations with the other countries of Latin America, as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina made so clear.

All through 1977, I have given a great deal of thought to the subject. My final conclusion was that I should vote for the treaties provided certain minimum requirements were met. They were enumerated in my testimony before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. In a few minutes, I will discuss the treaties in the light of my four conditions. However, before doing so, I think I should explain why, in principle, I decided in favor of ratification.

As I see it, the issue of ratification involves three considerations: First, the prevailing political and psychological climate; second, moral principles, and third, practical consequences.

As to the first consideration, I have to go back to the historical events of 1903 when Panama became an independent state. You will recall that prior to that date, there had been several abortive attempts by Panamanian nationalists to secede from Colombia. The 1903 revolution succeeded only because of the carefully timed arrival of American naval forces, who prevented Colombian troops from suppressing the uprising.

In some of our contemporary textbooks, this unilateral U.S. action and the subsequent treaty negotiations are usually condemned as an example of despicable imperialism. I object to this evaluation.

What the United States did in 1903 was nothing unusual or contrary to the public mores of those days. At the turn of the century, all great powers behaved similarly, and the speed with which the new Republic was recognized by all the Latin American governments, with the sole exception of Colombia, indicates that we simply acted in accordance with the "Zeitgeist," a term which Webster identifies as the spirit of the age.

Mr. President, I think everybody in this Chamber will agree that the spirit of 1977 is very different from the one which prevailed when we signed the treaty with Monsieur Bunau-Varilla, a Frenchman and an early big-time operator. Today, a very different spirit prevails, and it was the United States, which, in its foreign and domestic policies, did its level best to bring the changes about.

That change of climate is our own doing. This, of course, brings me to my second consideration, namely, the aspect of moral principles.

Mr. President, when the British departure from India came under discussion, it was the United States which was in the forefront of those who pressured for full independence. When the end of Dutch control of Indonesia was being negotiated, it was again the United States which suspended aid to the Netherlands East Indies, and followed this up with threats to cut off assistance to the Netherlands as well. Both steps were taken in order to coerce the Dutch Government into a more conciliatory attitude toward Indonesian nationalists.

The liquidation of the French and Belgian Empires in Africa was encouraged by American public opinion and the Government of the United States. Moreover, the new political climate was dramatically demonstrated by this country when it intervened in the Suez crisis. It was the United States which prevented the recapture of the Suez Canal by the British Army. It should be recalled that the American Secretary of the Treasury, George Humphrey, at that time gave the British Government a virtual ultimatum. Great Britain was given the simple choice of an immediate cease-fire or war on the pound. Not a dollar would be available for oil supplies. Unless the British advance toward the canal was promptly stopped, the United States would block access to dollars from the International Monetary Fund. It would block credit from the Export-Import Bank, and it would make no effort to align American bankers behind the pound. If the British persisted in trying to take back the Suez Canal, they would face a forced devaluation and gas rationing. Reluctantly, the British capitulated.

Mr. President, I have cited these excerpts from recent world history to remind this body of the crucial role the United States has played in promoting a new international morality. And I have to ask my colleagues today how could this country possibly have the effrontery to refuse to draw the consequences of its own actions? In the light of recent history, could there be anything more hypocritical than an insistence on the status quo in the Panama Canal.

Let me quote a paragraph or two from the columnist, Vermont Royster, in the Wall Street Journal. He served in the Panama Canal Zone in the earlier years of the Second World War. He says:

There we Americans, civilian and military, had our own housing, our own swimming pools, tennis courts, movie theaters and shops. The cost of all these things was nominal since they were tax-free and subsidized, which was very nice for a young man on an ensign's pay.

Things weren't quite so pleasant for a Panamanian. All these amenities were off-limits to the Panamanians, many of whom lived in near poverty. If a Panamanian did work for the Canal, he got lower wages than his American counterpart and had none of the privileges. He was also constantly reminded of his lower status by such things as separate toilets and separate drinking fountains, marked "gold" for Americans, "silver" for Panamanians.

So I have no trouble understanding the long years of resentment of the Panamanians at their second-class status in their own country and their years of agitation to get the status of the Canal changed.

Or, as Charles McCabe pointed out in the San Francisco Chronicle recently:

The Vietnam adventure also gave us some knowledge of how much the United States is truly disliked in much of the civilized world. In Panama, as an instance, this dislike is almost a part of the atmosphere of the Canal Zone.

My third consideration when reflecting on the issue, namely the practical consequences of rejection, can be quickly summarized. As I see it, rejection would impair all the good will we have in Latin America; it would poison our relations with most of the countries in the Western Hemisphere; it would give new force to the dangerous imagery of Yankee imperialism.

Mr. President, I shall turn now to the treaties which are before the Senate, and examine whether they satisfy the four conditions which I mentioned before. In my testimony, I stated the following:

(1) I would find it unacceptable if the executive branch through its actions preempted the issue and Congress could only rubberstamp a fait accompli.

(2) I would find equally unacceptable any agreements which would lead to the inefficient operation of the Canal and the imposition of an undue burden on American and world commerce by the operators of the Canal.

(3) I would find unacceptable any sudden and drastic changes of present operational and administrative procedures instead of a gradually evolving process.

(4) Finally, I would find it unacceptable if the executive branch negotiated an agreement which would not fully retain control of the military defense of the Canal and enable us to act promptly whenever there appears any challenge to such control.

Taking these up one by one, first, it is clear now that the Congress is not expected any longer to rubberstamp a fait accompli. The Byrd-Baker amendment which was prepared in close cooperation with the administration demonstrates that the objections of the Senate were heard. The effort to include the Senate in these historical deliberations came late—but it did not come too late.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It is with great hesitation that I interrupt a superbly organized and brilliantly succinct presentation. Although this is not the reason for which I rise, I should like to say to my dear friend and distinguished Senator that his recalling of the events at Suez was brilliant.

In 1956, this country would not accept the imperial powers of France and Britain returning to seize by force the Suez Canal, as they had planned to do. George Humphrey—not a man noted for visionary views, scarcely a member of the center of his own party, much less of the world in which it is my pleasure to live politically—George Humphrey knew you could not do that in 1956.

George Humphrey—of the M.A. Hanna Co., the very same Mark Hanna who helped put together the Panama Canal. George Humphrey—fundamentalist, Cleveland capitalist, banker, Republican Cabinet Member, Secretary of the Treasury, in 1956 in effect said to the British and French, "You can't do that, that day is over."

But I would like to congratulate the Senator for bringing up that issue, which he heard again in this Chamber.

But he asked about the proposal by the majority and minority leaders to amend the treaty to incorporate the statement of President Carter and General Torrijos. It happened that I was in Panama at the time with nine colleagues, a group led by Senators Cranston and Stafford, at the time this question arose.

We met with General Torrijos and his cabinet officers on these matters and we said, "Now, what would be the case if we amended the treaty to incorporate this language? Will that not require a new plebiscite in Panama according to your constitutional provisions with respect to the treaty?"

They were emphatic. They thought carefully. They took 24 hours to answer it. Their answer, when it came after a period of time, was the same as their initial response, "No, it will not." Because the general said, and his cabinet agreed, and there is no question of the fact, that the plebiscite took place after the Carter-Torrijos agreements was reached and was made public in Panama. The general went on TV in Panama to say in affect, "Now, when you decide to vote on this plebiscite, remember that the treaty comprehends the agreement, the agreement is simply an expression of our understanding of the treaty."

On this point, the Panamanians are quite clear as to their own constitutional procedures. I believe it is the case, I understand it to be the case in international law, that one looks to the procedures established by a nation to determine whether or not they have been followed. So I believe I can express to my colleague the feeling, the firm conviction, that no subsequent plebiscite will be needed. The treaty, as we have proposed to vote for it, has already been ratified by Panama.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator from New York, my very good friend, for clarifying this issue.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate my colleague's kindness. I have enjoyed the discussion between the two distinguished Senators from New York and California.

Assuming the distinguished Senator from New York is right, that there is no need for a plebiscite, and that the distinguished Senator from California is wrong, that there probably is, I still think there may be some other very interesting considerations with regard to the Carter-Torrijos agreement of understanding and the comparison between English and Spanish texts.

With regard to that, let me just give one illustration that might, I hope, be provocative and perhaps give us something to think about because, although the Spanish text is largely consistent with the English text with regard to the Carter-Torrijos statement of understanding, there is a discrepancy in the fourth paragraph of the document.

Part of the description given of "expeditious transit" is "with expedited treatment." That is in the English translation.

However, in the Spanish translation this particular language is translated as "contramitación simplificada."

The latter, however, means "with simplified procedures" with a strong connotation of "paperwork" rather than the expeditious transit and expedited treatment version of the English text.

I suggest that the distinguished Senator from California set forth some very interesting legal points here that really go beyond what my dear friend and colleague from New York has had to say about that and really mandate, in order to clarify these difficulties, probably a new plebiscite.

But even if we do not need a new plebiscite, we are going to see through the course of these debates all kinds of ambiguous differences and difficulties and different meanings between the English and Spanish translation, even to the extent of showing that there are whole paragraphs of the English translation left out of the Spanish translation in the Canal Treaty itself.

So I think the distinguished Senator from California, if I interpret him correctly and understand him even partially correctly, is doing the Senate a service by pointing out that perhaps this Carter-Torrijos statement is not the very best worded statement that has ever been made and the Spanish translation thereof really does not do the English translation justice, nor does it do the American people justice who have been led to believe that it means a lot more than it does.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I know I interrupt the Senator from Utah who is speaking at the courtesy of the Senator from California, but I wonder if the Senator from California would allow me to respond to that point?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator. I would like to make this point:

In international law, depending upon the terms of a treaty, the language of either or both parties can be equally authoritative. With respect to this treaty, the language of both the Spanish- and the English-speaking text is authoritative.

I see the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee on the floor and I ask him, Is that not the case?

Mr. SARBANES. That is my understanding.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Hence, with respect to the nature of translations, so far as the rights of the United States are concerned, and our rights to act under the treaty, we need only refer to the English text. Whatever it says in English, whatever rights are conferred in English, those rights obtain and we have the right to exercise them regardless of how badly the Spanish may have been translated regardless of whether there is a conflict between translations. What the treaty says in English is what we have a right to do. I offer that as a point of law.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate that very lucid explanation of one principle of international law, and I do agree that these present treaties provide basic equality, that we can interpret it in an English way and they can interpret it in a Spanish way. That is precisely the problem I bring.

As I understand one of the arguments of the proponents for these treaties, it is that we want to prevent any further discord and difficulties and unfriendly approaches to our neighboring friends.

If I correctly understood the distinguished Senator from New York in his prior statement, he said that it is certainly going to be a wonderful thing for us to be able to show that we are not imperialists any more and to set a new tone in the U.N., and to turn around the definition of the various countries in the U.N. toward the United States, and allow Cuba to take our prior reprehensible position as the leading imperialist in the world. The Senator did not say that, and I hope he did not even mean to imply that, but I inferred it from what he said.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I know the Senator is a careful and fair man.

Mr. HATCH. I always try to be.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. One might have thought from the United Nations debates and votes that the United States had this position. Of course, at no time did it in fact do so.

Mr. HATCH. I agree with the Senator.

The natural implication that listening to this might have taken from the Senator's statement was that we somehow had a reprehensible reputation because of the overwhelming antagonism toward the United States in the United Nations, which is nothing new to anybody on this floor or anybody living in the United States of America.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I know this is on the time of the Senator from California and I thank him for his courtesy.

I think it is important in fairness to the distinguished Senator from New York, because I was present earlier when he made the comments to which the Senator from Utah is referring.

Mr. HATCH. So was I.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator from New York made it very clear that it is his position that the United States is not in any way legitimately subject to charges of imperialism. In fact, the Senator from New York, has been one of this Nation's outstanding spokesmen in eloquently rebutting such charges and such allegations—in the United Nations, when he served as our very distinguished ambassador; as a public speaker across this country; and more recently as a very effective and distinguished Member of this body. He has been one of the Nation's outstanding spokesmen in rebutting such charges made unfairly against the United States.

It is for that reason, among others, that I think his perceptions with respect to these treaties and his strong support of the treaties carry particular weight in our consideration of this matter.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for his clarifying statement.

I join in saying that the distinguished Senator from New York, as ambassador to the U.N., was one of my favorite ambassadors to the United Nations and is one of my favorite Senators, and he is one of the most interesting legislators in this body.

On the other hand, I think that if we do not solve the problems of the difficulties and discordant future difficulties which may very well arise as a result of the differences in the two translations, and if we do not face those in the Senate at this time and provide for the protections that the United States deserves, we are going to wind up reaping the whirlwind on this treaty well into the future and well past the 20th century.

Again I compliment the distinguished Senator from California for this one point that he is making and for his lucid comments with regard to the Panama Canal treaties. He has voted carefully and well on the floor of the Senate in many issues, so it is difficult for me ever to find fault with the distinguished Senator from California, although we do disagree on many of the issues with regard to the Panama Canal. I thank him for allowing me this time.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator from New York, the Senator from Maryland, and especially the Senator from Utah for the clarifying statements, and I am grateful to the Senator from Utah for pointing out the ambiguities he finds in the treaty.

Mr. President, the Senator from California finds a different ambiguity in the Byrd-Baker amendment, and he would like to comment on it.

I am also concerned about the proposed new language which reads as follows:

Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity political independence of Panama.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this new language is questionable to say the least. It provides for a new ambiguity, and I actually wonder whether the original text, if left alone, would not serve our purpose better. As I see it, the added phrase can provide an unfriendly Panamanian Government with a useful rationale to challenge any American military intervention as encroaching on the territorial integrity and political independence of Panama. To be sure, our Department of Justice, when facing this question, declared "a legitimate exercise of rights under the neutrality treaty by the United States would not, either in intent or in fact, be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

In my judgment, Mr. President, the Department of Justice's declaration misses the main point. The crucial question is, what will be regarded as "legitimate" after the year 2000? Obviously, if the Governments of the United States and of Panama are in agreement as to what is a "legitimate exercise of rights," there will be no problem. Under these circumstances, actually no treaty would be needed. The problem will arise if there is disagreement.

I call attention to the contemporary methods of what might be called camouflaged aggression which should cause us grave concern. Senators will recall that it was the evil genius of Adolf Hitler that invented this new device. He used it first when he manipulated an invitation to occupy Austria. According to him, he was not an aggressor. He was accepting an invitation.

The occupation of Austria was an act of naked aggression, but technically it was made to appear as simply a response to an invitation. Hitler applied the same technique again when the German Army was "invited" to occupy Prague. Naturally, the Soviet Government was not slow in following suit. The Baltic countries were occupied in similar fashion. And when Brezhnev decided to send troops into Czechoslovakia, the Soviets attempted to solicit an "invitation." Because the Czechoslovakian Government refused to play ball, an invitation by Czechoslovakian workers' councils was eventually accepted in lieu of anything better.

Mr. President, I do not want to be overcritical, but I think the Senate should know precisely what it is doing. I believe the treaties ought to be ratified, and I will support the leadership in its efforts. I am still uncertain whether I shall vote for the Byrd-Baker amendment in its present form or whether I will abstain. In either case, I shall also introduce an understanding to be added to the resolution of ratification to read as follows.

This will be the resolution of ratification that we shall be working on in this body:

Before the period at the end of the resolution of ratification, insert a comma and the following: "subject to the following understandings, which are to be made a part of the instrument of ratification, that—

"(1) the agreement 'to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty' in article IV of the Treaty means that either of the two Parties to the Treaty may, in accordance with its constitutional processes, take unilateral action to defend the Panama Canal against any threat, as determined by the Party taking such action. Nothing in this Treaty or in this Understanding may be construed as conferring upon the United States of America a right of intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama; and

"(2) the phrase 'transit the Canal expeditiously' in article VI of the Treaty assures the United States of America that, in case of need or emergency, its vessels of war and auxiliary vessels may go to the head of the line of vessels awaiting transit of the Panama Canal."

This additional text will make it crystal clear that the United States retains the right, in perpetuity, to come to the defense of the canal whenever it deems this necessary. By voting for an understanding rather than for an amendment, the Senate will follow a well established practice which has been effectively used on previous occasions. The convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes of April 7, 1906, the International Agreement at Algeiras of April 7, 1906, the London Treaty of 1930, the treaty with Mexico of November 8, 1945, and the treaty with Japan of February 21, 1911 are some of the precedents which come to mind. If the Senate's understanding is communicated to the Government of Panama, and is accepted or acquiesced in there is no issue, and the treaty need not be reopened, for discussion by the people of Panama.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. Hatch and Mr. Moynihan addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Clark). The Chair recognizes the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I want to compliment the distinguished Senator from California for many of his ideas.

I would like to take a few minutes, however, at this point in the debate to mention a few things that I think are quite important.

I particularly enjoyed the interesting, if not volatile, recitation of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina of some of the military interpretations that he has and his sterling defense of the present members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. On the other hand, I have to be very concerned that the American people understand that there are, as I understand it, well over 300, as many as 379 retired generals and admirals who are totally against these treaties because they have read them and they have studied them. They understand the military and security implications of these treaties as well as the present leaders of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I do not think anybody really should impugn the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff because I believe they believe what they have said. As a matter of fact, some of the things that most of them have said before the Senate Armed Services Committee come down to basically, "We wish we could stay in Panama, we wish we could keep the status quo, we wish we could maintain our 17 or more military bases and air force bases down there, our refueling facilities, and all of the other things that means so much to the defense of this country and to the security of all of this hemisphere."

But in this imperfect world some of them have said, I think, in those terms, this is about the best we can do. Their understanding is based upon information given to them from, I understand, the State Department, the Ambassadors, the administration, and others, and they have accepted these statements.

But I would like to call to the attention of the American people, Mr. President, and of course all of my distinguished colleagues here that four former Chiefs of Naval Operation, Admirals Carey, Anderson, Burke, and Admiral Moorer have all come out strongly opposed to these treaties.

Admiral Moorer is very significant because he was, as I think everybody knows, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff prior to General Brown, from 1970 to 1974. He has made a number of eloquent statements before various Senate and House committees in this matter, and I think has laid bare many of the weaknesses and erroneous assumptions about these particular treaties.

On the Panama Canal's importance to the U.S. defense interest, Admiral Moorer stated:

There is no feasible war plan for the United States, taking into account our reduced forces and extended commitments, that does not assume that the Panama Canal will be available for full-time priority use. The only alternative that would permit the meeting of time scales of current war plans based on the threat in both the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans would be a major buildup of naval combat forces overall, together with a very large expansion of supply and communications storage facilities for both the Army and Air Force on both coasts. The utility of the canal has been demonstrated over and over again in times of emergency. World War I, World War II, the Korean War, the Cuba crisis, and the Vietnam war all placed heavy loads on the Panama Canal which were efficiently handled to the great benefit of the United States and her allies. I see no change whatever in the critical contribution of the canal to our military strength in the near future or in the out years far beyond the meaningless year of 2000.

Admiral Moorer was of the opinion that if the "Canal operation was slowed down or stopped, the timing of any war plan we have immediately collapses." In fact, that is a direct quote from Admiral Moorer.

Concerning the importance of U.S. presence in Panama, Adm. Thomas Moorer stated:

I believe a permanent U.S. presence in the Panama Canal Zone to be the only feasible and safe posture for all of the nations of this hemisphere.

He then added:

Do not be surprised if the treaty is ratified in its present form, to see a Soviet and/or Cuban presence quickly established in Panama. In any event, any confrontation over the neutrality of the canal then becomes a confrontation with the Soviet Union rather than with Panamanian guerrillas or terrorists.

In response to the question on the importance of the United States having base rights in Panama after the year 2000, Admiral Moorer responded:

I think it is mandatory that we maintain a presence through one kind of agreement or another.

With regard to global implications of the treaties, Admiral Moorer stated that:

The defense and use of the Panama Canal is wrapped inextricably with the overall global strategy of the United States and the security of the free world.

I submit that, if the United States opts to turn over full responsibility for the maintenance and operations of such an important waterway to a very small, resource poor and unstable country as Panama and then withdraws all U.S. presence, a vacuum will be created which will quickly be filled by proxy or directly by the Soviet Union as is their practice at every opportunity.

The admiral also noted that:

Anyone who has observed Soviet actions since World War II and studied their literature concerning maritime affairs soon learns that the Soviets fully understand the importance of the Panama Canal.

He added that:

The prime reasons that the Soviet Union accepts the burdensome support of Cuba is due to their desire to dominate the Caribbean, including the Panama Canal, as they greatly expand their maritime capabilities—both warship and merchant ships. We have here the development of a Torrijos-Castro-Moscow Axis.

He brought out some pretty important things on the internal threat to the canal on a variety of occasions, but let me skip that for now and talk about some of his comments concerning Panama's ability to operate and defend the canal.

Concerning Panama's capability to run the canal, Admiral Moorer stated:

The overall capability of Panama to maintain and operate the canal after the year 2000 when the United States is required to withdraw is a troublesome point.

He further noted that "the Panama Canal with its locks, pumps, and electrical controls is extremely more complex technically than the sea-level Suez Canal. Furthermore, Panama is a very small country with a population about the size of Atlanta, Ga., that is, 1.7 million. She is led by a military dictator with Marxist leanings," Admiral Moorer says. In fact he goes on to say, "political opponents have been exiled. Until recently all political activity has been outlawed. The press is controlled. The country is heavily in debt, and spending 40 percent of its income carrying its debt. Panama has no heavy industry worth the name and is woefully lacking in management skills as evidenced by the fact that several large-scale construction projects attempted recently have failed. It is very doubtful whether Panama will acquire the capability to maintain and efficiently operate an industrial complex the size of the Panama Canal, even long after the year 2000."

On Panama's ability to defend the canal, the Admiral stated: "One must consider the contribution of the Panamanian Armed Forces in the defense of the canal. What will happen when the United States leaves in the year 2000 under the terms of these proposed treaties? How long before the canal falls in unfriendly hands? With the second smallest population in Latin America, Panama's army consists of nothing more than 1,500 light infantry with no modern equipment. In addition, there are about 6,000 of the Guardia Nacional who are assigned police duties, including making certain that Torrijos remains in power through removal of political opponents. It is apparent that some of the Guardia Nacional, such as Colonel Noriega, the Director of Intelligence, are hostile to the United States * * *. In any event, Panama's capability to defend the canal is practically nil."

William P. Clements, Jr., former Deputy Secretary of Defense, testified in opposition to the treaties. He stated the treaties "were far too complex," deploring the "multiplicity of instruments" and the "ambiguous" clauses. He favored a "complete overhaul" of the treaties and focused his opposition on three points—defense, economic considerations, and U.S. rights to build a new sea-level canal.

With regard to defense aspects, Secretary Clements found the security clause of the treaties "totally unacceptable." He revealed that in 1975 at the request of President Ford he went to Panama with Joint Chiefs' Chairman George Brown and negotiated with General Torrijos a security clause which was later agreed to by all U.S. parties, including the State Department and the National Security Council. Secretary Clements testified that Torrijos also approved this clause and it "was included in the then existing draft of the treaty" and remained intact "in the treaty as proposed until sometime after January 20, 1977." The agreement, as reported by Secretary Clements and printed in the committee record, was as follows:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the canal, the Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts, to secure respect for the canal's neutrality and security through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each party shall take such other diplomatic, economic or military measures as it deems necessary in accordance with its constitutional process.

In other words, what Secretary Clements was saying is that they had worked out a neutrality agreement that better protected American security, that was agreed to by the Panamanians in 1975, and written into the body of the earlier treaty. This original language is far superior to what we have in these treaties today, because it would have given the United States greater protection, and would have solved some of the problems of international law which have been raised here.

That is very important, and it amazes me that our present ambassadors are trying to sell us a clause that does not come close to the guarantees of the original language.

First they try to sell us an ambiguous treaty without adequate neutrality provisions protecting the United States in any way. They argued that if we ever changed the treaties, my goodness gracious, Panama would have to have a new plebiscite. They even disagreed with my distinguished friend the Senator from New York (Mr. Moynihan) that international law would take of the problem.

So President Carter and Mr. Torrijos got together and orally agreed on this new statement of principle, which is not one-fifth as effective, as impressive, as legal, or as clear and straightforward under international law as what had formerly been agreed to by both sides. All we have to do is agree to this wonderful new oral agreement, which they reduced to an unsigned document, which I would submit is not worth the paper that it was not signed on. And that if we would do that, there would not have to be a plebiscite.

Now, as a result of some of the forceful arguments that many of us have made all over this country, and the fears and concerns of the American people, the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader, have come forth with an amendment supported by 77 cosponsors and are going to try to amend the treaties now, something they said could not be done without a plebiscite. Or at least that is my understanding of it. Now they are willing to amend the treaties, and I understand the distinguished senior Senator from New York, my dear friend Mr. Javits, has said these amendments will not add anything to the prior treaty, that everything was implied in the prior treaty; but I understand he also is a cosponsor of these amendments.

What I am saying is this: To ignore better than 300 generals and admirals who have served this country patriotically and with distinction in favor of these supportive-to-the-administration statements of our present Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other members of the Joint Chiefs, is tragic, and I think it is detrimental to this country—especially Admiral Moorer, who was recently Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and incidentally knows every aspect of the canal. I do not mean to denigrate the Army or Air Force, but I have to admit the Navy really understands the operational aspects and importance of the canal, I think, much better than any other branch.

To ignore the other three former Chiefs of Naval Operations is equally tragic. To accept what the State Department has to say at face value, after all the appeasement we have gone through in the last 30 or 40 years, while this country has gone downhill in the eyes of almost everyone in this world, would be a serious error.

I do not want to reflect on the present Joint Chiefs, because I believe them all to be honorable men and good men. But I do think that they should have looked at the many years of appeasement that we have gone through, the many years of mistakes by the State Department—mistakes prophesied by many Senators who sit in this sacred body.

Secretary Clements testified that lawyers in the Defense and State Departments assured him the words in this clause, "as it deems necessary," gave the United States the "unilateral right" to intervene to assure the security of the canal.

Secretary Clements found the new clause—and remember, Secretary Clements is the former Deputy Secretary of Defense—he found the new clause, relating to the maintenance of the "regime of neutrality" "ambiguous" and expressed the opinion that if Torrijos agreed to the clause he had negotiated in 1975 then stronger words than those in the present treaties are and should be negotiable.

Secretary Clements also testified that in his opinion and that of international lawyers with whom he had talked neither article IV nor the Torrijos-Carter understanding gave the United States a clear right to intervene.

(Mr. Metzenbaum assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. I would just mention for the record that what we are doing here is a very serious matter. I would like to join in supporting my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen), who, in my opinion, is one of the greatest Senators sitting in the U.S. Senate, certainly one of the leading parliamentarians in the Senate, and perhaps the constitutional authority in the Senate. I would like to support him where he indicated that he hopes, and I hope likewise, that our distinguished colleagues in the Senate do not get so bound up in partisan support of the administration's desires that we abdicate our responsibility, or, should I say, responsibilities, to see that these treaties, if they have to be ratified in the end, or if we have to advise and consent to them, at least are protective of the United States of America; that they take our needs into consideration; that these treaties resolve these ambiguous problems; that they resolve the translation problems so that there is no question in the minds of our friends, the Panamanians, or any questions in our minds, as to the effect, legal or otherwise, of these treaties.

I think some pretty effective and important amendments are about to come forth on this floor. I have some amendments which I think are monumentally important, and which I hope my colleagues will consider in helping to make these treaties much better than they are right now.

I have made the comment that a second-year law student in one of the major institutions, and I do not mean a mental institution but a law institution, can do a better job writing these treaties than what has been done.

I cite the statement of Secretary Clements, who did an adequate job, if not the best job, with regard to the neutrality language that they had worked out with Mr. Torrijos earlier.

I believe it is important for us to realize that it is wonderful to have friendships and relationships with Panama. I do not think anything is really going to change that, because most of us want to continue a good, cordial relationship with our Panamanian neighbors. This has come about through years and years of working with them and years and years of experience with Panama. I think most of us love the Panamanian people. I do not think they would expect us to not protect the United States of America, since that is our primary job as U.S. Senators.

If these treaties, which I find to be reprehensible, poorly written, legally unsound, filled with ambiguities, filled with construction difficulties between the English and Spanish translations, are not corrected, then I have to admit I would not blame any citizen or the millions of citizens of this country if they hold it against us the rest of their lives.

The proposals should bring about some changes, which, in my opinion, are long overdue anyway, because of the last 40 or 41 years of control by one philosophy of the Congress, particularly in the Senate.

I think the people of this country, and I regret to say this but I think it is true, have inherited, the vast majority of them, more knowledge about these treaties than any of my protreaty colleagues have been willing to admit.

I think in spite of the polls, which still show that most of our people are overwhelmingly against these treaties, if the truth were really known 75 to 80 percent of the people in this country will not buy these treaties.

I think it is pretty important that we, as U.S. Senators, give every consideration to all amendments which will be proposed, especially those which tend to make these treaties more understandable, and especially those amendments which would tend to protect the Constitution.

Concerning our colleagues in the other House of this coequal branch of Government, and especially those amendments which pertain to solving the ambiguities of the treaties, especially those amendments which pertain to clarifying the need to have all appropriations bills originate in the House, in advance, rather than bringing them back after a fait accompli has been accomplished, I think if we ignore them, as the distinguished majority leader has said he is going to do—and I assume with his leadership majority are going to follow in a partisan way—if we ignore the House of Representatives in this matter, then I cannot blame them later if they refuse to grant anything that any administration would want with regard to the problems that are bound to arise as a result of our failure to do our job legally, internationally, and otherwise to resolve the problems of these treaties.

It is discouraging to me that there seems to be such a lack of understanding, a sense of uncertainty. There are certain protreaty Members who have made a great study of this matter, of course, of all matters involved here. Unfortunately, I do not believe that the majority of those who will vote for these treaties have really done everything they can to try to protect American interests.

I believe this is a pretty serious matter. I consider the Panama Canal treaties one of the most important issues to come before the Congress. I think there will be few other major important issues. Of course, what we do with agriculture, energy, and labor reform, are of significant. What we do on SALT II is even more important.

I believe this year is going to determine whether the United States of America continues to be the leader of the world, the leader of freedom in the world, the country to which the other nations point toward freedom and look up to.

I think if these treaties have to be ratified—and I have not given in to the belief that 67 Senators in the Senate are going to vote their consent to the ratification—I happen to believe that if they are going to be ratified my colleagues should be concerned about having ratified treaties which are worth while, which have unambiguous meanings for solving some of these very great problems which are being raised. If we have the treaties, let them be right.

I can say this: I have always been, from the beginning of the debate in this matter, in favor of reviewing the 1903 treaty.

I have always been for treating our Panamanian neighbors well and decently. I think there are many ways we could do that without these treaties. I still think there are many ways that we could have a cordial and decent relationship with Panama and still have the indiscriminate, inexpensive and, I think, expeditious management of the canal which the United States has rendered for so many years, for the benefit of everybody in the world, not just us. I think many people are concerned about these treaties. I think our obligation is, if we have to have ratification, to make sure that we are not ratifying a pig in a poke. I suspect that if these treaties are ratified with only the amendments of our distinguished colleagues, the majority and minority leaders, then we are going to have troubles the rest of our lives that far transcend even some of the troubles that are being raised if these treaties are not ratified.

On the other hand, if we could have enough amendments to clarify and make these treaties the effective treaties they should be, beneficial to the United States, taking into consideration our needs as well as our Panamanian neighbors' and friends' needs, then I think there would be a great deal less hostility engendered in this country toward those who vote for the treaties and those who do so without very good consideration of the needs of our country, in the rapt desire to satisfy and pacify the Panamanian dictator and others, who I do not really believe are friends of the United States of America.

As a matter of fact, I do not think these treaties are going to create any friendship toward the United States of America. I think if anything showed up as the result of the private hearings, the secret hearings, on the drug issue, the thing that did show up is that we have some pretty sleazy people down there with which we are going to have to deal for many, many years, and that their interests are certainly not going to be those of the United States. Nor are they going to coincide with regularity with those of the United States of America.

So, I appeal to my distinguished colleagues to consider every good, substantive amendment to these treaties and maybe, in the process, there will be some support for the treaties that would otherwise never be expected. Maybe, in the process, we shall save ourselves untold embarrassment, difficulties, and entanglements which could hurt this country and many, many other free countries and people who rely on the United States to have some guts in this world and to stand up for its rights once in a while.

I think that there are many things on both sides of this issue that anybody can be for. I think there are good arguments on both sides. My personal belief is that, unless these treaties are seriously and significantly amended and modified to protect this country and to protect our interests, no reasonable Senator should vote and give his consent to the ratification of these treaties. Although this is not the time to get into a debate on the constitutional issue, and I shall not do that at this time, I believe that any Senator who fails to recognize the importance of 219 Members of the House of Representatives, some of whom are for these treaties, and their right to approve the transfer of $10 billion of American properties—at least five different types of American property—is, I think, allowing an unconstitutional act to occur.

I am going to bring up an amendment which will get into that detail, and I am sure we can debate it at that time. But I think that my colleagues should consider, and consider well, just how important these treaties are, reject the partisan approaches that I sense on the floor of the Senate, and start working to have these treaties properly corrected. This is our duty, our solemn obligation, and our right. I think if we will, we shall have done the Senate a great service. We shall have added to the prestige of, and respect for, the Senate. We shall have done the President a great service, because he is much less likely to suffer in the future in the eyes of the historians. And I think that it would create a lot of good will and good feeling all over this country among our American citizens and constituents, whom we all represent.

I might just add—does the distinguished Senator from New York wish me to yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I rise to take the opportunity to state that I had hoped the Senator would speak longer. I have listened with great absorption to all the things he has said. My point cannot be made as a parliamentarian. I shall listen with further patience and sure addition to my meager stock of knowledge.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate the statement of the distinguished Senator from New York. I do have some other things I wish to say, but I can see that he might have some points to make, so I yield at this time.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator from Utah for his graciousness and for his learned, careful ways. He would know that there could have been few persons to come into the Chamber in recent years with as pronounced a sense of fairness and a concern about accuracy and a civility of manner. It was typically courteous of him to allow me to speak at this point. To begin, may I say what is not always easy to say, and not always the most useful thing to raise, in this Chamber. I have been struck by the pattern of the vote taken yesterday, an important vote, Mr. President, a vote in which it became clear that these treaties, products really of the past four Presidents, will be ratified. The Senate of the United States will advise and consent to their ratification. The vote yesterday clearly marked the moment in which the Senate was first on record as favoring these treaties.

What struck me was the geographical disparity as between those who voted to support the treaties and those who could not yet do so.

There are 23 American States which border on the high seas, whose shores are touched with saltwater, whose lives are much involved with navigation and commerce on the high seas.

I was struck how Senators from these States were so overwhelmingly in favor of these treaties; indeed my State of New York is nothing if not a commercial seagoing, outward bound State. I see that the junior Senator from Maryland is on the floor. I note that the Senators representing Baltimore, the Senators who represent San Francisco, Oakland, Seattle, and up and down and around the coast support these treaties. Altogether there were only 10 Senators, only 10 Senators of the 46 which represent the 23 seagoing States, who voted against these treaties.

Of those who did, overwhelmingly they were from another bloc of States that voted "no," which is from the States of the Old South. Thus, two groups of Senators voted "no." Those from the high plains and those from the Old South.

Since I have the respect which we all have for all of these Senators, it seemed to me to confirm a thought that has been in my mind, which is that there are not 10 Members of this body who truly do not support these treaties. But there are a number of those who are legitimately concerned that the people in their own States do not.

It is the high plains and the Old South that find these treaties worrisome, that find the subject unfamiliar and threatening, and somehow fear that we will lose what we must hold onto if we approve the treaties.

These are proper and honorable concerns. I would wish to speak to them. I should wish to speak first to a point which is, perhaps, difficult to make, but it is necessary: That the times have changed, the world has changed, and for all the glory that the Panama Canal represented, for all the extraordinary ability that it stands, for the incomparable, palpable manifestation of American achievement that it is, that it should somehow end in fear and alarm in a world of separate drinking fountains, one gold, the other silver, separating people.

When I was in Panama in a delegation led by Senator Cranston and Senator Stafford, it happened that that day in the Miami Herald, a lieutenant commander, retired, U.S. Navy, wrote to the paper a letter which was published that day describing the events in 1964 when a riot occurred in the zone, and between the zone and Panama, when persons were killed, when President Johnson reacted to an emergency he had not expected, when the present sequence of negotiations began, involving four Presidents and culminating in this debate on the treaty. This U.S. naval commander—I noted that he was U.S. Navy, and he was not a Reserve commander, he was obviously a regular naval officer—described how painful it was to see, in which, a group of young Panamanian students who in accordance with the prior agreement came forward bearing a Panamanian flag which they were going to raise on the flagpole as agreed. Young Americans, egged on, as this letter said, by adults cheering and jeering at them, proceeded to beat up the Panamanians, to discredit their flag, to do the most awful things, things which we associate with the worst, the least agreeable and dishonorable aspects of a frightened colonialist mentality. How inappropriate to this Republic, how rare in our experience, and how squalid an episode in the aftermath of the glory of this canal.

Now, this is the point: We are not retreating by this move; we are advancing. If we advise and consent to the ratification of these treaties, we will see a transformation of the world scene as we have not seen in a generation.

At long last, the charge and the curse and the burden of imperialism, the greatest democracies of Europe, and the less consequential, but similar and real charge against the United States, will have been put into the past honorably, with courage, manfully. And what will remain in the world but the one last 19th century empire, not only undiminished in the 20th century, but expanded? The empire of the czars and the new czars, astride the Continent from the Pacific to the Atlantic, to the Bosphorus, now into the Red Sea, now into the Indian Ocean, now into the South Atlantic, with its Ghurkas from Havana, its Afrika Korps recruited to do the murdering and burning and killing. The Soviet Empire, finally, will emerge as what it is, an abomination, an anachronism, a threat to the peace of the world against which the best loving and best needing nations of the world must combine.

Far from a retreat, ratification of these treaties will turn the world on its heel. The United States can go forward as it has not done since the great days of the Second World War when we stood almost alone in the defense of freedom.

The distinguished Senator from Utah speaks of this year as one in which it will be judged whether the United States remains a leader of freedom in the world. It will be, and it will be determined by whether or not we ratify these treaties.

I think it so important and I was so pleased by the statement, the reference of the distinguished junior Senator from California, who reminded us that there was a reality in the way we obtained the canal. It was not attractive, but it was characteristic of the time.

But we have ever since been the anti-imperialist, anticolonialist force in the world.

We are the nation that stated to the British they must get out of India. It was Franklin D. Roosevelt who started saying that to an unbelieving Churchill in 1943. It was the United States that said to the Dutch that they must leave Indonesia. We said to the French that they had no help in Algeria. We said the same thing to Spain and to Portugal. Incidentally, remember, in 1935, the United States said it would have an end to colonial rule in the Philippines. It happened that came in 1945 on schedule, in 10 years' time.

I see the distinguished Senator from Idaho rise.

MR. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield?

MR. MOYNIHAN. With great pleasure.

MR. CHURCH. First of all, I wish to commend the Senator for an extraordinarily brilliant and eloquent speech. Let me make the following observation.

In 1956, an attempt was made by British and French forces, in combination with Israeli forces, to repossess the Suez Canal, which had been seized by the Egyptian Government. As I recall, it was the United States that intervened at that time to say:

No. The repossession of the canal by British and French interests is an anachronism. The Egyptians are entitled to reclaim jurisdiction over their own territory.

We stood with Egypt in its right to repossess Suez.

How ironic if, having stood with Egypt in 1956, we now refuse to practice what we preached and applied a different standard in Panama.

The Senator from New York made a very telling point when he stressed the role of the United States in encouraging the dissolution of the empires of the 19th century, a process which began before the Second World War, but which greatly accelerated afterward. The United States was in the forefront, preaching our traditional values; namely, that foreign powers do not have a right to occupy other lands, to subjugate other people against their will. Even as we asserted our own right to independence 200 years ago against the British, so we recognized the right of other colonial people to claim independence in the years following the Second World War.

Now, having done that, our posture would be cynical indeed, if we refuse to relinquish our own control over virtually the last strip of land outside the United States, in a foreign country, that we are holding against the will of the inhabitants of that land.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Precisely.

Mr. CHURCH. I think the Senator makes an irrefutable point, and I commend him for it.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator from Idaho for bringing to mind and for providing an opportunity to present to this Chamber an irony that surely should be introduced to the minds of those who have not yet persuaded themselves to vote for this treaty—the events of Suez.

Those who have read the extraordinary and careful report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the U.S. Senate, of which the Senator from Idaho is the second-ranking member, and will soon be the chairman, will note that on page 47 there is a short description of the not perhaps widely known but important fact that the canal probably would have been built in Nicaragua had it not been for the energy of Mr. Bunau-Varilla and a particularly active New York lawyer named William Nelson Cromwell, of the firm of Sullivan and Cromwell. Mr. Cromwell had the great coup of enlisting the support of Senator Mark Hanna of Ohio, who had helped elect President McKinley—previously Senator McKinley—and was a great force—and had been appointed to the Senate—and a great influence on this Nation; not perhaps a progressive one with respect to some social policies but certainly a forward-looking one with respect to the structure of the American economy. That was in 1903.

A mere 53 years passed, and the British and the French invaded the Suez with armies. The distinguished Senator spoke of our having preached against colonialism. Certainly, we spoke of it as a moral issue, and the word “preach” is altogether appropriate. We did more than preach. We acted.

In that October 1956, the Secretary of the Treasury said to the British Government:

If you persist, we will break the pound. You will have food rationing and unemployment and depression as you have never known. We will break the pound with the power of the dollar, because there is an issue of principle here.

Who was this man, the Secretary of the Treasury? He was Mr. George Humphrey. And what had he done in his life? In 1918, he had joined the M. A. Hanna Co. of Cleveland and had risen to be its president in 1952, when he joined the Eisenhower Cabinet. Was George Humphrey a radical? Was he a visionary? Was he a man given to soft and unsuspecting views of the world? No. Alas, no, he was not.

Did he think that the whole weight of American power should be put against the effort of the British and the French to regain control of the Suez? Yes; he did, because he knew in 1956—the president of the M. A. Hanna Co. knew in 1956—that you cannot do things like that any more. Yet, here we are in 1978 wondering whether what we absolutely forbade the British and French to do, we should somehow insist upon for ourselves.

I should like to speak to the extraordinary success of our negotiations and the fact that we have learned something from this history, unlike the French, driven out of their possessions, and the British, in effect driven out of their position in the canal, going back in that squalid and doomed enterprise. Compare the dignity, the manfulness with which we leave—a measure of dignity, while retaining the full measure of our rights and responsibilities. One of the extraordinary and ominous facts of the world was the degree not 5 years ago to which the Panama Canal issue had been transformed from a bilateral problem between Panama and the United States into an international problem. Panama is not a major strategic issue in the world. It is not an area of any overriding geopolitical concern to the large powers. The nations that depend upon it for commerce are the liberal nations of northern South America, I think we can basically say. It has not engaged the military or economic concerns of the world.

However, in the beginning of the 1970's, it became a great symbolic issue, an issue of the ideological clash between North and South, between liberal societies and the totalitarian societies which would side with the South, and it was an issue on which we were hopelessly outnumbered, completely misunderstood, and at least partially in the wrong, by our own standards.

This perhaps will not any longer remain a secret. I hope I am not subject to censure for recalling that in our closed session the other day I raised the question of the meeting of the Security Council of the United Nations which took place in Panama City in March of 1973. I think it would be useful to go back to that not distant time, 5 years ago, and to recall the atmosphere and the events of that moment.

In 1972, for the first time, the Security Council met outside of New York, met in Addis Ababa, and shortly thereafter, the Panamanian Government proposed that the next meeting be in Panama City. For a moment, it looked as though there was a move to take the Security Council away from its headquarters in New York altogether and have it move around to colonial areas of the world where, as the General Assembly had already become, it would become a forum in which the judges sitting with the verdicts in their pockets would hear the indictment of the United States and of the liberal democracies still left in the world.

Sure enough, the meeting began in the spring, in March of 1973, and representatives of 40 nations spoke before the Security Council. One by one, as President Ford stated in his 1974 message to Congress reporting on the activities of the United States in the U.N. for the previous year, a majority of the independent nations of Latin America, and indeed a third of the membership of the U.N., rose to demand, one after the other—and I quote President Ford's message:

Most of these supported the Panamanian position that the 1903 U.S.-Panama Isthmian Canal Convention should be abrogated and Panama should be given effective sovereignty over the Panama Canal.

A draft resolution was voted on at the end of the meeting, on March 21, a resolution, cosponsored—and I shall give some of the cosponsors: Guinea, Peru, Sudan, Yugoslavia, tyrannical states, arrayed in their hostility to the United States, except when it comes time for the United States to give them military aid, as in the case of Yugoslavia, which by the way then becomes temporarily more sweet.

In the end, the Security Council voted 13 to 1 against the United States, to condemn the United States, to disassociate itself from the United States. Our friends on the Council, and there were some like Britain, France, they also voted against us. We had to resort to the veto to save ourselves from the formal condemnation of the Security Council.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Happily.

Mr. CHURCH. The 13 to 1 vote represented, did it not, the unanimous decision of all other members of the Security Council, for the one vote cast against the decision was the veto cast by the United States; is that right?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The veto, the kind of measure the United States said it would never use, the kind of measure that is associated with the Soviet tyranny. Here we were condemned and resorting to the veto, resorting to power, because persuasion and argument had failed.

Mr. CHURCH. I think that it would be instructive to include at this point in the Record, if the Senator will permit, a list of the members of the Security Council that cast their votes for the resolution which called for the abrogation of the 1903 treaty and the restoration of Panamanian control over the Canal Zone and the canal.

Those countries voting in favor of the resolution were Australia, Austria, China, France, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Kenya, Panama, Peru, Sudan, the Soviet Union, and Yugoslavia. Our oldest and closest ally the United Kingdom, did not vote with us but abstained.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Every democracy on the Security Council either voted against us or abstained.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes. And among them some of our very best friends and closest allies, countries that have the closest ties with the United States, France, Australia, and the United Kingdom.

There could not be a more conclusive vote to demonstrate that the world is not with us. We cannot apply one standard to our own conduct and a different standard to the conduct of other governments. I agree wholeheartedly with the distinguished Senator from New York that nothing would be more helpful in rallying the free world behind us than to ratify these treaties.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I observe that the distinguished Senator from Texas wishes recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from New York will withhold a moment, I believe the Senator from Texas—

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from New York was about to note that the distinguished Senator from Texas has brought some associates into the Chamber and I am sure he would wish to speak at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the Senator very much.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the Neutrality Treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for its courtesy. This pleasant opportunity to meet with fellow parliamentarians from Mexico brings to my mind and brings me to that point in my remarks where I am going to speak to precisely the question of our relations with the other nations of this hemisphere.

I have suggested that the Security Council meeting in Panama 5 years ago showed the extent to which we had lost control of the terms of references of this discussion of the countries who participated in the Council's discussion. There were in addition 25 countries including such non-Western Hemisphere countries as Algeria, Mauritania, Zaire, and Zambia which participated, the point having been to establish first in Addis Ababa, then in Panama, the nature of a vast presumed American hegemony and threat to the independence of other nations. And of all these countries none sought to do so with more vehemence than the dictatorship of Cuba, and Cuba invariably sought to link the Canal Zone to Puerto Rico as an example of American imperialism.

Remember, Mr. President, Cuba is saying, "We will force the Yankees to leave Panama," where clearly we were there by right of treaty, and next, "We will force them to leave Puerto Rico," where we are present as part of a freely associated commonwealth relationship, a democratic relationship.

I would read from the report of the Security Council of that year:

The representative of Cuba stated that the hemisphere showed clearly the growing gap between development and underdevelopment in Latin America and the growing development of the United States which, usurping the rights of the native population, extracted the wealth of those countries, taken over their natural resources, forced labour conditions down, exploited investments, forced financial dependency upon them, broken off scientific exchange through the transmission of obsolete technology, and was engaged in ideological penetration and political domination, as well as diplomatic and military usurpation.

Let me say to those who have been wearied by debates in the Senate that I sat in the Security Council for many a long month and heard more and more of this. The same Security Council meeting adopted a resolution almost word for word, speaking about usurpation and profit. I see that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska has risen.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for a few questions?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Happily.

Mr. CURTIS. The distinguished Senator is a very careful student of history. I would like to ask him, is there any justifiable complaint against the United States over the manner in which they have operated the canal with respect to all of the commerce of the world, including the operations, the costs, and the charging of tolls?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. No, sir, in my view there is none.

Mr. CURTIS. Do I understand that one of your arguments in favor of the treaties is that to not ratify them smacks of colonialism, and to ratify them turns our backs on such an argument?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Precisely. I believe it would be seen as such by the rest of the world.

Mr. CURTIS. Would that same argument apply to Guantanamo Bay in Cuba?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The occupation of Guantanamo Bay in Cuba is by right of treaty which we obtained in association with the defense of Cuban citizens fighting the imperial and colonial control of Spain. These matters are wholly different. That was brought about in a full and free association with the Cuban State. That was not the nature of the Panama Canal Treaty.

And curiously enough, even Cuba does not raise that point. I have often wondered; they ask us to get out of New Jersey, but they do not raise a question about Guantanamo.

Mr. CURTIS. I believe equally good students of history may have a different interpretation on the Panamanian Treaty than my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. There is no doubt of that at all.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, what parallel or what similarity is there between the colonial situations of the past of Africa and Asia, before the colonial powers abandoned them, and the treatment of the people in the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I say to the Senator from Nebraska, I would speak to this, and I would speak as someone who has been in the old colonial world. As the Senator knows, I served as U.S. Ambassador to India for a period, and I have traveled around there. If you have ever been in a colony—as you, of course, have been, sir—nothing is so obvious. You leave the stray pigs, the tin roofs, the battered Coca-Cola sign, the beer sign, and the mangy dog, and you turn the corner. The grass is green, the houses are painted white, the servants have white linen jackets, the ladies are in long linen and they have large hats, the verandas are screened, the drinks are iced, the husband is coming home from tennis. It is a different world, and it is so palpable and it is so real, and in Panama you can reach out across a street not much wider than my reach, and touch, on one side, those tin shacks, and of the other those filigreed verandas. And it is such a contrast, it is a contrast like saying, “one drinking fountain is for us and the other drinking fountain is for you.”

It is a contrast such that when young men, as I was speaking earlier of the events of 1964, when young men of Panama respectfully and civilly presented their own flag to be raised, by a prior agreement, to fly alongside the American flag in the middle of what is their own country, American boys tear down that flag, desecrate it, beat them up, and riots start in the night throughout the slums.

It is so achingly familiar and it is so awful, in some ways, because we are not that kind of people. We never got spoiled by colonialism; that spot never touched our lungs. We have always spoken for freedom in the world.

Mr. CURTIS. The argument of my distinguished friend is very powerful. My question was, What is similar and parallel in colonial operations to our treatment of people in the Canal Zone?

My question amounts to this: What did the United States do within the zone that was unjust to people other than U.S. citizens?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator raises a careful question, and he phrases it with the kind of thoughtfulness and care and concern for facts which is characteristic of him and has made him so highly regarded a Member of this body.

You ask what did the United States do that was unjust? It did not do anything that was unjust, Senator. It is just that the fact of our being somehow became intolerable.

How could the British in India, in the heat, when it rises to 120° in the summer, and the summer lasts 9 months, and it seems that there is no green thing left in the world, and life is an inferno—do you blame them for having fans, when they could not live without them? Do you blame them for having a lawn that they could play a little croquet on, and remember the green, wet island they came from? No. But, oh, what different worlds come up side by side.

No Panamanian, to my knowledge, was treated unjustly, but what a cosmic injustice it is to sit there in the heat of the tenelements on Fourth of July Avenue and look across the street and up the hill at those fine ladies on their filigreed porches, in their white linen hats, and their beautifully groomed servants serving iced drinks in the afternoon.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, now, I do not know what that has to do with these treaties, but I can cite the Senator a parallel circumstance. For almost half a century, the Republicans on this side of the aisle have looked over to a party that has had a monopoly on the legislative branch of this Government for half a century.

We have watched all the committee chairmen be of one political party, all the majority leaders, all the determinations of what the legislative program shall be, for a long half-century. An injustice? An unequal operation? There has never been a bill named after somebody on this side. [Laughter.] They are always named after the chairman, if they are good bills. [Laughter.]

That has nothing to do with the Panama Treaty. The fact that some people live on one side of the street and have ice in their drink and another has to drink out of the pond does not necessarily have any connection with this treaty.

My dear friend has said that there is no complaint the way we operated under the treaty. For the benefit of the world he has said there has been no mistreatment on the part of the Americans of the non-Americans in the Panama Canal Zone.

Now I want to ask this question: What authority or power of intrusion did the United States have in the Republic of Panama outside the zone to deprive them of their economic rights, political rights, or infringe upon them in any way?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Once again I would like to respond to the Senator's question. To my knowledge, none. But I must hold the Senator a moment, because he has suggested the differences between the two sides of this Chamber. I would have to be more explicit. The Senator raised the proper question, but would he like to know what it could really be like? We could stage this. It might be instructive to some of the Members on the Senator's side. It would not help our side, I am sure. There are Members of the Senator's side who are not yet for this treaty. It would be useful. We would have to get permission of the Rules Committee.

Does the Senator see the rug he is standing upon? Take that rug off. The Senator seems to have shoes on. Would he be kind enough to remove his shoes?

Mr. CURTIS. I have boots on.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Boots? Boots are even more inappropriate to colonial people. The Senator has a handsome and characteristically sharp jacket on. Would the Senator mind taking that off and the necktie, too? That is a sign of a bourgeois status, and the Senator is not bourgeois.

The fine desk that Calhoun himself may have used, would the Senator take that away? We have some orange crates for the Senator. We have mahogany desks, of course, but the Senator should have orange crates.

The Senator appears to have electricity. That will not do. We will get him a kerosene lamp or candle so he can do the best he can. We will turn off the heat in the winter and the air conditioning in the summer and let him sit there for 60 years and see if he does not think we have it a little better on this side.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator contend that if we do not have to take off our shoes and we can walk on the rug that we have equal political power here?

Not at all, not at all. We have had nothing to do with how the country is run. You have had all the votes. You have all the chairmen. You have all the leaders. You have had it for almost a half century. You have left this country with a debt that is staggering, with a deficit that is frightening, with wild inflation, overregulation sapping the energy of the country.

Now I want to ask another question. The Senator has stated that we have not imposed any of the colonial aspects of control upon either the non-Americans in the Panama Canal Zone or the citizens of the Republic of Panama outside the zone. What is it that is similar to colonialism in reference to the Panama Canal?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. What is it?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. First, I must say a point of correction must be made. I observe the members of the Senate Finance Committee, of which you are the ranking minority member. Surely you do not mean to tell me, after a year of having watched it, that you do not have a say in the way the country is governed, and a good say, too.

Second, what does it have to do with it? It has to do with the fact that we in the Canal Zone are in the middle of their country. It has to do with the fact that it has become something—though, a century ago or two centuries ago some would not think it unusual. Remember, the world changes.

Remember after the failure of Queen Anne to produce a male heir in 1706, if I recall, the British people, a people as committed to liberty as the world has known, the people from whom our own liberties come, found themselves without a king. You have to have a king. They sent over to Germany to get one.

It is one of the theories of the British Parliament that the power of the Cabinet grew because for almost the whole of the 18th century the Kings of England could not speak English, which is true. They could not. People ignorantly think that they spoke German. But at that time no self-respecting German would speak German. They spoke French. At that time a French-speaking German King ruling an English nation was natural.

But it would not be so today. Times have changed.

You cannot hold a canal in the middle of somebody else's country today.

Mr. CURTIS. But there is a big strip of land between the State of Washington and Alaska. Is that colonialism on somebody's part?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The "colonialism" happened when we bought Alaska from the Russians, who had stolen it from the Indians. As for Canada, think of the difficulties which arise from the fact that one of the nation's Provinces predominantly speaks French. Many among them do not want to be any part of Canada any more.

This is an age of sensitivity about things which not long ago were not sensitive. There may be too much sensitivity, but it will not change reality.

Mr. CURTIS. Just because something is sensitive, does that mean it is right?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It means if you do not take the pulse of that sensitivity, you can make a profound mistake. As far as the Panamanians are concerned, they are asking for rights which descend in direct lineal descent from the rights we asked from the British. They expect us to behave as we would expect others to behave who are not concerned.

Mr. CURTIS. How do you know what the Panamanians are asking? They have not had an election since 1968. Who is speaking for the Panamanian people? No one was ever elected. They have not had any elections since 1968.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Sir, they certainly had a plebiscite and the result was overwhelming. It was 506,000 to 245,000.

Mr. CURTIS. A plebiscite on what?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. A plebiscite on this treaty.

Mr. CURTIS. No; the gentleman who says he is head of the Government, who was never elected, brought in some figures. But I ask, how do you know who is speaking for the Panamanians?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is why we cite the Hebrew. There is a phrase which says, "Ha-mavin yavin." It translates, "Those who understand, understand."

Mr. CURTIS. I will accept the Senator's translation.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. If you have any feeling for the future, and you know that you do, you know they hate that thing in the middle of their country. They just want us to say we stop owning it. They are quite prepared to have us operate it.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, you are confusing hating with coveting. When I see someone with a beautiful head of hair, I try not to hate them but I would like to have hair like them.

[Laughter.]

We cannot wipe out all of this desire of the have-nots to have everything that the haves have by ratifying a treaty that causes us to relinquish an operation where there is no complaint about the way we have operated it.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. No, sir, you cannot wipe out that desire, but you can wipe out the judgment of the world that we are in the wrong.

Sir, I do not care a little or a damn what the dictators of this world think, and I have said that before. But what Australia thinks and what the Netherlands thinks and what Canada thinks and what Costa Rica thinks, that matters to me, as it does to the Senator. And, sir, there is not one of them today that thinks we ought to persist in our present occupation. I cannot imagine there is one today. If there is, I shall be interested to learn of it.

I see the Senator from North Carolina is on his feet. Does he know of a democratic nation that thinks we should not ratify these treaties?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, one: The United States.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is the issue that will be decided on this floor, as the Senator well knows, and there was a good indication yesterday.

Mr. CURTIS. The distinguished Senator just brushed aside the dictators, in which I thought he meant the people. The only country where the people are speaking on this that I know of is the United States. I do not think the people have spoken in many other countries.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I believe, sir, that the latest polls show that a plurality of the American people favor these treaties. But the decision will be made by their representatives here, and it will be made carefully and fairly. I think the indication yesterday was encouraging; the votes are in this Chamber to advise and consent to the ratification of these treaties.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank my distinguished friend.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. May the Senator from New York yield, as I believe I have the floor?

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator from New York yield in order that I may ask the distinguished Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. Before we reach final vote on these treaties, the polls should clearly indicate that what is now a plurality favoring the treaties has become a clear majority of the American people. Would the Senator from Nebraska then vote to ratify them?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, I have not that much faith in the polls. I do not base my statement that the American people are against this on the polls; never have, never will. But I have not been here four decades without learning how to keep in touch with the people back home. I have done this personally. And they are not for this treaty.

So far as the polls are concerned, anybody who has the money can hire a pollster. Election after election has proven that, usually, they are obsolete by the time they are printed, because they have to assemble things and world events take place, people change their minds. So the answer is, No, I would not be governed by a poll.

I thank my distinguished friend for his generosity in yielding time and time again.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank him.

I see the Senator from Oklahoma rising.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I shall yield for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course.

As I understand the discussion that took place between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from New York took the position that sovereignty over the canal by the United States was the source of the ill will and feelings of dispute and contention between this country and Panama. Is that more or less correct?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes. I do not know that either of us used the term, "ill will," because I shall shortly speak to the point of the extraordinary degree to which the peoples of these countries have kept on good terms, which is the basis for our future relationship.

Mr. BARTLETT. Am I correct, too, that the Senator from New York believes that the sovereignty issue led to a different system of law and order in the Canal Zone as opposed to Panama itself, a different school system, different standard of living, and that all this helped develop the feelings of contention between Panama and this country?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Yes, sir, it does.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is my opinion, also. I share that. However, I, take the position that it does not require giving up American operation of the canal to resolve the sovereignty issue. It would seem to me, and I am curious as to what the Senator from New York would think of this proposal, that the treaty could include a negotiation or include an agreement by which we would have a lease on the Canal Zone. This could be on a much smaller part than we have now, roughly a third of what we now have, and that we would agree, of course, to hire Panamanian nationals and so forth. But the basis of the treaty would be similar to what we have at Guantanamo Bay, a lease being renewable indefinitely, which was the original idea, as I understand it, between our country and Panama, and before that, Colombia.

Would the Senator think that this might resolve the difficulties that have developed between these two countries because of the sovereignty questions?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I should like to say to the distinguished Senator that I recognize the sensitivity of his remarks, just as I would say the same about the Senator from Nebraska, of whom I did not have the opportunity to respond, when he said what he thinks when he sees a beautiful head of hair: He did once; he married her.

The point is that, the Senator from Oklahoma is addressing the question of sensibility here, and correctly so. My feeling is that the proposal he makes is no longer a real option for the United States. It is my feeling that we must advise and consent to the ratification of these treaties or face a calamitous period ahead.

Mr. BARTLETT. It seems to the Senator from Oklahoma, as he looks at the treaty, that he should judge it based on what he thinks the treaty should consist of. If those who have negotiated the treaty over a period of a number of years, as has been the case, have, in the opinion of the Senator from New York, lost the opportunity of such an option as a lease, I do not think this should impact on me or impact on the way that I think the treaty should be. I feel very strongly that the country that manages and protects and defends the canal is very important and that, in this hemisphere, there is really only one country other than the United States—perhaps Canada, if they were interested, and I am sure they are not—having the capability, financially and otherwise, to do the job.

Other than that, I do not think there is such a country. Because of that, I feel that eliminating the sovereignty problem is a means of establishing a treaty and an agreement with Panama that would provide the mechanism by which this country can continue the management of the canal and also solve the basic problems that have led to what I think the Senator in general referred to as colonialism. There would not be the colonialism, any more than there is where we have Clark Field or where we have various bases in Spain which are leased. We have certain rights according to that lease. But we definitely do not have sovereignty, nor do we claim sovereignty, nor does anyone feel that we do.

I feel that getting rid of the canal—maybe that is a rather rough way to put it—turning the canal over to Panama is not the only solution to the sovereignty question; that the sovereignty question can be addressed in another way by our national leaders.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I should like to say, and not for the first time, that I have learned a good deal from the Senator from Oklahoma. I say, as I conclude my remarks, he has given me great hope and has certainly given me a clear understanding that our task on the side of the supporters of the treaties—of course, on both sides of the aisle—is to persuade him that what he and we both wish to accomplish can best be, in the most practical way, accomplished by these treaties. As is so much the case here, and so happily the case, there is no bitterness in this room; there is no bigotry in this room. There are men and women seeking the best arrangement.

I would like to conclude my remarks by a short description on how good these arrangements really are, how extraordinarily well our negotiators have done, how wisely the four Presidents involved have held out for these terms.

I was speaking 2 hours ago, I believe, about the Security Council meeting in Panama City in 1973 and I was reading this passage from the report of the official document from the Council, a significant passage in which they are describing the position of Cuba. I would like to read those passages:

The main item on the agenda—in the view of the Cuban Ambassador—was the threat to international peace and security in the Hemisphere that lay in neo-colonial relations imposed on Panama by the United States under a treaty that infringed and violated the most elementary norms of international law, Cuba considered that the perpetuity of that neo-colonial agreement should be abrogated, and the concessions as well, because there have been no free consent. The will of the United States had been imposed without the approval of the Panamanian people.

And so it went on.

Then it came to the issue that must command our attention. It said:

The hour had already struck when all forms and manifestations of colonialism and neo-colonialism in Latin America must be wiped out, including the Associated Free State of Puerto Rico.

Now, shortly thereafter, 2 years later, in March 1975, the Bureau, as it is called, the Central Committee of the Nonaligned met in Havana. I now speak to a matter that has been partially disclosed and partially not disclosed, and I will disclose it all.

The Bureau represented 117 countries in the world, and at the end of this meeting of the nonaligned—neutral as between the Communist nations and the free nations, but meeting in Communist Havana—a document was issued which began by stating the number, giving the names of the members of the nonaligned that were present. And then they said that present as observers were a number of countries, Argentina, Africa, Bolivia, countries like that. And then they listed the Socialist Party of Puerto Rico as an observer member government.

The Socialist Party of Puerto Rico. The Socialist Party of Puerto Rico, I hasten to be clear to the democratic socialists of this world and particularly this country, is the Communist Party in Puerto Rico. Yet, it was listed and recognized by three-quarters of the nations of the world already in a condition of a sovereign government.

Now, the Senator from Utah earlier today spoke of the greater success which Mr. Clements, the distinguished former Deputy Secretary of Defense, had had in the summer of 1975 in drafting a clause with respect to our relations with Panama which, unaccountably to me, the Senator from Utah thought superior.

Let us read this clause. It says:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the canal, the parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for the canal's neutrality and security through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means.

Now, in the summer of 1975, as to the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the most he could think to get was an agreement that we would consult with respect to conciliation and the International Court of Justice if the security of the canal was threatened. Three years later, can we not be struck by the strength of the treaty we have, indeed, far stronger than anything Mr. Clements could have envisaged?

It says that the two nations, that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality. Not seek conciliation, but defend with use of arms, and that is the right we proceed with and continue to maintain in this treaty, and it is a precious right.

I would like to make two points in conclusion. First, I began by saying that far from representing retreat in the world, these treaties mark the beginning of the era in which the Soviet empire will break, for it will be the last left in the world, and the sooner the better.

The day when we ratify this treaty that we sign the death warrant for Soviet Russian imperialism throughout the world. Mark if this is not the fact.

In stark contrast to the rest of the world, only the Soviet empire stands astride Asia, Europe, and now seeking to penetrate Africa, and acts as if it were still 1903, as if it could still send armed people anywhere and kill anybody and get away with it. They think they can, and have, because for the past 30 years the issue of world debate has been the colonial legacy of the West, and not the colonial reality of the Soviet empire.

Now we hear the pleading of former Soviet satellites, such as Somalia, crying, "Help us, the Cubans are here, the Russians are here, help save us," they say.

In 1975, I cannot describe the contempt and hostility of the Somali Government toward any effort by the West, any effort by us, to say, "Your interests are in a world of free nations and independent nations; you have no interest in a world with union to the Russian imperialism."

They were contemptuous of us. Now, today, they are pleading for some help.

I shall take the liberty to return to take up that particular theme at a future time. I would sum up my statement and thank the Senator from Idaho by simply saying that those Americans who are consulting their fears in this matter should look to their hopes and summon their courage because this is not a moment of retreat.

This will be an event that will mark the moment when the world at last saw that, as against the dark night of tyranny that hangs over the Eurasian landmass called the Soviet Union, and the bright light of freedom that emanates from these shores living in that light of freedom is incomparable and that freedom will be the choice of the overwhelming majority of the nations of the world.

We shall look back with pride and a sense of honor that this Chamber commenced that process.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I will not take the Senate's attention long. I want to talk about an aspect of this treaty and the voting on it that has not received the attention of the Senate but which has received the attention of the House. In fact, more than half the Members of the House have petitioned the Supreme Court to determine whether or not the Constitution requires both Houses of Congress to act in the transfer of U.S. territory.

Mr. President, I rise to discuss one of the fundamental and most important issues arising out of the Panama Canal Treaty, the role of the House of Representatives in the disposal of territory or property of the United States. The issue stems out of the Constitution itself, which in article IV specifically grants to Congress the power to dispose of territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The question is this: Does article IV require the consent of both Houses of Congress before American property in the Canal Zone can be transferred to Panama? Or can public land be given away by a "self-executing" treaty without the subsequent consent of Congress?

Mr. President, I am amazed that this issue has been treated so cavalierly by proponents of the treaty. Oh, the problem is mentioned in the committee report, but the committee stretches and strains to dismiss it.

A handful of precedents that are easily distinguished are given for the proposition that a treaty can be substituted for the will of both Houses of Congress.

Court cases which have nothing to do with ceding public property to a foreign nation absent implementing legislation are cited to uphold the give-away of the canal free of the added deliberation which would be required if both the House and the Senate had to act on the matter.

Yes, arguments have been made to defend cutting out the House from its constitutional role in the transfer of Federal land or property. But these arguments are no more than that—arguments. They do not hold up.

What we are given by the Attorney General and the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee report are not facts, but assumptions. They argue in circles, assuming that the view they start out with is the correct one.

For example, the committee and the Attorney General rely heavily on a statement by the Supreme Court in the case of Geofroy against Riggs, which says that the treaty power extends "to all proper subjects of negotiations between our Government and the governments of other nations" but does not "authorize what the Constitution forbids." The committee uses this bare statement to assume that it knows what the Constitution forbids and does not forbid.

But the quotation does not answer that question. In fact, if the paragraph quoted from were read in full, it would be clear that the Court added a restriction on the treaty power which is directly relevant to the Panama Canal Treaty.

What the Court actually said is this:

It would seem to follow that a treaty which purported to exercise the power exclusively granted to Congress would require implementing legislation as is the case when the treaty requires appropriations.

On the basis of this sentence, I would contend that the Panama Canal Treaty requires implementing legislation, since it purports to exercise a power exclusively given to Congress, the power to dispose of property.

The way the treaty proponents read the quotation, the Court meant that nothing at all is forbidden to a treaty unless the Constitution expressly uses the word "forbidden" or the words "you shall not do this." Under this reasoning, the President and the Senate could levy taxes on the people by a treaty, since nothing in the Constitution expressly forbids a treaty from being used to raise taxes.

Article I, section 8, only provides that Congress shall have the power * * * To lay and collect taxes. * * * It does not say that Congress alone shall have the power. Nor does it say that Congress shall have the exclusive power. As the distinguished legal authority, Professor Berger, has asked in his critique of the administration position, what then is to distinguish the taxing power from the article IV power to dispose of property?

Mr. President, I think the question answers itself and exposes the error defenders of the treaty have fallen into when they rule out participation by the House in transferring the Panama Canal. If they are serious in their contention that the full Congress need not act to dispose of public territory, then the precedent they are asking us to take in advising and consenting to the treaty is more dangerous than anyone imagined. Very few of Congress powers could not be usurped in a similar way by treaty, using the same reasoning that is used today to bypass the House in the Panama Canal Treaty.

Moreover, I am impressed by Professor Berger's analysis that the Geofroy case has nothing at all to do with the disposition of Government property because it actually involved private rights of inheritance in the District of Columbia. In fact, the case was decided in accordance with a preexisting statute of Congress, a far different situation from the present one where Congress is being cut out of the decision.

Mr. President, I am also surprised to see several cases listed as authorities for the Panama Canal Treaty which involve treaties with Indian tribes. As we all know, a trust relationship exists between the U.S. Government and Indian tribes. Many courts, including the Court headed by Chief Justice John Marshall, have referred to the Indians as being in a guardian-ward relationship with the United States. This is well documented in legal briefs prepared by the Library of Congress in July and August of last year.

Thus, to call Indian communities foreign nations in the sense of foreign countries, not within the limits of the United States, is stretching pretty far for a precedent.

Even if there were some kind of precedent in these treaties, they would no longer be valid because both Houses of Congress acted more than a century ago to repudiate the use of treaties in dealing with Indians. In the 1860's Congress thoroughly debated the practice of transferring public lands to Indians by treaties and emphatically decided that thereafter no soil of this country would be sold or given up without the approval of both Houses of Congress.

Congress did not simply express this policy in a sense of the Congress resolution, but it spelled it out plainly in two statutes enacted into law—the act of March 29, 1867, and the act of March 3, 1871. Thus, the Indian treaties and cases are not valid precedents to be relied upon today in determining the role of Congress in disposing of the Panama Canal.

In fact, Mr. President, I think we can discard case law as the basis for our decision of this question. I think both sides of the issue will agree that there is no Supreme Court case squarely deciding a contest between the House of Representatives and the treaty-making power. But that is exactly the situation we are facing today.

There are presently more than a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives—219, to be exact—who have joined in sponsoring a resolution declaring that any transfer of property in the Panama Canal Zone must receive the specific authorization of an act of Congress passed by both Houses.

In these circumstances, Mr. President, I believe we should do more than just argue from uncertain judicial and historical precedents that are not really on point. In my opinion, the answer to the question does not lie in court cases, but is to be found in the Constitution itself and in the intent of the framers.

On this basis, I am convinced the framers meant for both Houses of Congress to act before public land or territory could be transferred to a foreign country.

I believe the framers deliberately wrote article IV into the Constitution as one of the checks and balances of Government so that there must be consideration by both the Senate and the House of Representatives before Federal land or property can be conveyed to another power.

This is a matter that closely touches all the people. The transfer of the canal and Canal Zone assets, whose replacement value is nearly $10 billion and whose operation is closely linked to the economy and security of our Nation, is a subject of the gravest importance. It is undoubtedly the kind of public action which the framers did not want taken until it had received the most extensive and thorough deliberation.

Mr. President, I am amazed that in this day and age, when everyone is worrying about what is called the Imperial Presidency, my colleagues do not refer back to the original purpose of the framers, who wanted to place a check on major actions of the Government that may harm the country.

The matter did come up in the State conventions on ratifying the Constitution. There was much concern expressed during the ratification process about the possibility of yielding, by a treaty, territory that might be valuable to the economy of a particular State or region. But this fear was specifically rebutted at the Virginia Convention.

Governor Randolph, who was a delegate both to the Federal and Virginia Conventions, took note of the objection when he remarked:

But it has been said that there is no restriction with respect to making treaties.

His answer was that the Constitution provided "the most express restriction" on sacrificing the property rights of the Nation in article IV, which empowers Congress to dispose of territory or property of the United States.

Randolph was not the only one who took this view. Francis Corbin added at the Virginia Convention that the people were protected against rash treaties by another provision of the Constitution. Corbin said that if property is sought to be transferred by an agreement in the nature of a commercial treaty—a description which clearly is applicable to a treaty relating to commerce through the Panama Canal—"the consent of the House of Representatives would be requisite, because of the correspondent alterations that must be made in the laws."

So I believe the framers definitely intended for any proposed transfer of property or territory, which may have an important bearing on the economy or security of any State or region in the country, to receive the consent of both Houses of Congress, acting together with the President, before it would be valid.

But it is not necessary to prove that Congress has the exclusive power to dispose of public property. George Leonard, a well known attorney with considerable experience in constitutional matters, testified before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers last year, that in the case of the Panama Canal treaties, the true question is: Once Congress has legislated on the subject, can the canal and the zone be conveyed without the approval of Congress?

Here there is a special situation. Congress, as a joint body, has acted on the canal since at least 1902. In the Spooner Act of that year, Congress authorized the President to acquire property and "perpetual control of a strip of land" in the then territory of Colombia and to "perpetually maintain, operate, and protect thereon a canal" from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. It was pursuant to the will of Congress in the Spooner Act that the Panama Canal Treaty of 1903 was negotiated and concluded.

Since that time, Congress has established courts, enacted civil and criminal codes, provided for defense, and maintained, administered, and operated both the canal and the Canal Zone.

In the fact of this considerable activity by Congress concerning the Panama Canal, Mr. Leonard believes Congress has preempted any concurrent power which the President, together with the Senate, may have had to dispose of the canal and land in the zone by treaty.

In fact, we have always before used legislation passed by both Houses of Congress in order to cede property in the Canal Zone to Panama. In 1932, it took legislation to authorize the Secretary of State to modify the boundary line between Panama and the zone so that a new legation building could be built on foreign soil, that is Panamanian territory, instead of American territory.

In 1936, a treaty was signed relating to the disposal of certain property to Panama. This treaty was specifically qualified by the following words: "When the authority of the Congress of the United States shall have been obtained therefore, the Government of the United States will transfer to the Republic of Panama" the property in question. Thus the treaty itself openly required subsequent action by both Houses of Congress.

Then in 1943, a joint resolution was approved authorizing an executive agreement for the transfer of certain land in the Canal Zone to Panama. During Senate deliberation over this resolution, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Tom Connally, unequivocally took the position that under the Constitution "Congress alone can vest title to property which belongs to the United States." He added:

So, if we had a normal treaty before us and if it should be ratified, it would still be necessary for the Congress to pass an act vesting in the Republic of Panama the title to the particular tracts of land. * * *

Finally, in 1955, another treaty provided for the transfer of land to Panama. Three provisions of that treaty related to the disposal of territory and property. Although two of those three provisions did not expressly call for implementing legislation, Assistant Secretary of State Holland informed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in writing that legislation would be needed to implement the transfer of all the territory and property covered by the treaty.

In order that there may not be any question about the meaning of the State Department position at the time, I will quote from the exact words of Assistant Secretary Holland's written statement. It says:

Legislation will be required to implement the following provisions of the treaty and memorandum of understandings reached:

Then, dropping down to paragraph (b), the State Department paper continues:

Articles V, VI and VII of the treaty and item 2 of the memorandum. Transfer of certain lands and improvements to Panama. Authorizing legislation is required.

That is about as clear as anyone could say it. Articles V, VI, and VII of the 1955 treaty were the sole provisions providing for the transfer of lands and the State Department specifically identified each of those articles as requiring authorizing legislation passed by Congress before the treaty would be effective.

This conclusively settles the matter as far as I am concerned. It is clear that past practice shows that territory transferred to Panama must have the approval of both Houses of Congress. This makes the situation far different from any of the so-called precedents set forth in the committee report, one of which is the 1955 treaty with Panama, which I have shown the State Department itself conceded required legislative authorization from the full Congress.

Finally, Mr. President, there is no question but that we own property in the Canal Zone.

First, we paid $10 million for title to land originally held by the Panama Railroad, which according to a State Department fact sheet dated September 16, 1977, constitutes about one-third of the zone.

Second, we paid $4 million to buy title to lands held by private owners in the zone, which according to the same State Department fact sheet, covers another one-third of the territory.

And, third, according to the 1903 treaty we have acquired all the rights, power and authority in perpetuity in the entire zone that were needed "for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection" of the canal. This clearly gives us property rights, even if we do not have complete sovereignty over these lands.

In addition, we own the physical plant there and the defense facilities.

Indeed, the State Department fact sheet admits:

The facilities used in connection with the operation and defense of the Canal as well as facilities used by other agencies of the United States in the Zone are property belonging to the United States.

In summary, Mr. President, under Article IV of the Constitution, this means that the Panama Canal Treaty cannot become effective, even if it is given the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, until the House of Representatives acts favorably on the issue.

Even if the Senate should approve these treaties—and that is a big "if"—we should not do so unless an amendment is attached requiring implementing legislation for the transfer of territory and property.

Mr. President, I might observe that back as far as October of last year this implementing legislation was recognized as being necessary by the Department of State and we were told that the implementing legislation would be on the Hill within a few days. To my knowledge this implementing legislation has not reached us as of yet and yet I think it is perfectly clear by precedent of the State Department, Congress, and the Constitution that such legislation must be before us and must be passed before we attempt to give anything of value away from the country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch) has introduced such an amendment and, when it is called up, I will have more to say on this subject.

I thank my colleagues very much for allowing me the time to discuss what I consider to be an important issue, and I yield the floor.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long on the remarks that I am making this afternoon. I commend the Senator from Arizona for the timeliness and the content of his remarks, which raise a very serious legal question. He mentioned the implementation proposals that we felt a need for during our hearings in the Senate Armed Services Committee, but, of course, we could not wait.

Mr. President, I plan to make a more complete statement on the entire Panama Canal Treaty proposal at a later time. However, I feel that I have a responsibility to the Senate to present and summarize the information that the Armed Services Committee developed relating to the financial situation or potential financial situation as it would exist under the proposed treaty.

We held relatively brief hearings on this proposed treaty, Mr. President, in our Armed Services Committee. The primary jurisdiction—and there never was any dispute over that, of course, was with the Foreign Relations Committee, but we do have a certain jurisdiction and responsibility under the rules of the Senate with reference to the management or the rules regulating the Panama Canal, and also any matters, of course, that relate to the defense of the Nation. So it was with reference to preparedness, military preparedness, and the consequences of the lack of the canal or the uncertainty under this treaty, that we addressed ourselves to primarily.

On the financial side, we very deliberately went into this matter. We had time. We employed our own consultants in the financial field, capable people who were highly recommended. We had the benefit of the esteemed and valuable Director of our General Accounting Office, Mr. Elmer Staats, whose entire staff, or rather part of it, has been making quite a survey of the financial situation with reference to this proposed treaty and matters related thereto. And we had the benefit, too, of the testimony of a very exceptional, excellent man that I had not known until these hearings came about. He is the present so-called business manager—his actual title is Governor—of the canal, Governor Parfitt, who is a very competent, capable manager, on the merits and on the costs.

Mr. President, it is important that the Senate fully understand the financial situation that did exist and will probably exist under the Panama Canal Treaty if it is ratified.

First, the Senate and the American taxpayers should know in advance how much money it will cost to implement the treaty over the next 22 years. In fact, to put it briefly, we should not buy a "pig in a poke."

Second, because the financial elements are so important to the treaty, and one of the principal reasons for having a treaty at all, there should be some assurance that the relations between Panama and the United States will not be endangered by 22 years of misunderstanding or uncertainty, or haggling over money matters. Both countries ought to have a common understanding of the financial provisions of these proposed treaties, and that is why we went into this matter financially, and went into the outer perimeters of some possibilities.

Our committee, as I have said, engaged a consultant and held hearings with expert witnesses, including the two I have recently mentioned, and then undertook a special staff study by competent members of our staff to summarize the key financial questions raised by the treaties.

Now, this was right at the conclusion of our hearings. We had to file the first report thereon—we were exceedingly anxious to, of course—before this matter was called up and the debate started. Some additional staff work was required on these figures—and that is the only reason for the delay—which I am now presenting to every Member of the Senate, the media, and the public at large. It is not in the nature of a supplemental report, but it is a summary of all the facts with reference to the financial matters.

During the February recess I sent a draft of the staff study to the Secretary of State, so that he could review it and have a chance to provide his comments. Later I shall request permission to have printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks the complete committee staff study, and, in a sense of fairness, the Secretary of State's comments thereon, together with brief additional comments on the State Department memorandum. This procedure was adopted in the interest of fairness and completeness on these summaries, before they went out to the Senate and the public.

I want to summarize, now, for my colleagues, where the debate on these financial issues stands.

WILL THE CANAL PAY FOR ITSELF?

First, will the canal pay for itself? First there is the question of whether or not revenues from canal operations will be sufficient to meet expenditures, including the payments to Panama under the treaty, during the life of the treaty.

If the canal operates at a net loss over the 22 years of the treaty, the U.S. Government would be called on to pay the loss, since the canal is to be turned over to Panama debt-free in the year A.D. 2000.

Governor Parfitt, to whom I have referred, who is sometimes called the business manager of the canal and actually is the Governor, and Mr. Staats, the Comptroller General, both warned, before the Armed Services Committee, that there was a substantial possibility that the canal would suffer operating losses beginning about 1983.

Now, I remind and caution that these are calculations, but some calculations have to be made. It is the only way we can really determine what are probably the facts.

Administration studies show there is a distinct possibility that the canal will not be self-sustaining. The State Department agrees that there is uncertainty, but asserts that "revenues will be sufficient to meet expenditures." The State Department presents no evidence for this assertion beyond 1983, and makes no estimate of net profit or loss after the year 1983.

HOW MUCH CAN TOLLS BE RAISED?

The fact is that no one knows how much tolls can be raised in a very uncertain international transportation market. No one can be certain just what the traffic will bear. No one can make an actual money statement of facts. We do know that U.S. pipelines, U.S. railroads, and to some extent large tankers and cargo ships, are becoming more competitive with the canal.

Since the canal was opened in 1914, tolls have been raised only about 40 percent, all of that since 1974. Think of that. From 1914 to 1974, the tolls were not raised. Since those toll increases have taken effect, shipping through the canal has dropped about 6 percent per year. All experts and those who have dealt with this problem do agree that there is some limit to the amount the tolls can be increased without driving away traffic to the point of financial collapse. The question is, What level is too high? At what point do the financial burdens on the commission that drive tolls upward begin to result in net operating losses?

The administration cannot give us anything concrete to rely upon past 1983. The committee staff study shows that in the unlikely event tolls cannot be raised above current levels, the canal will suffer a $3.5 to $3.7 billion operating loss over the period of the treaty.

As I say, those are just figures which are not written in concrete. No one can be certain about them. They are, however, based on the unlikely event that tolls cannot be raised above current levels. I assume they can be raised some, and will be raised, but there is the starting point.

Assuming no loss of traffic due to toll increases, tolls would have to be increased 149 to 168 percent to offset this deficit.

That is the increase which would be required, to put it in another wording, to offset this prospective deficit to which I have referred.

The committee staff study shows if tolls can be increased only 75 percent above current levels by the year 2000, the canal would suffer an operating loss of about $1 billion.

This is as near as we can get to a hard, rock-bottom calculation.

This is by way of illustration of what we might be facing as a downside risk of appropriations being required and the prospective amount.

APART FROM POSSIBLE OPERATING LOSSES, WHAT WILL THE TREATY COST?

The second question is whether or not, aside from possible operating losses, the U.S. Government will have to pay certain costs as a result of the treaty. The answer here is clearly "Yes." The committee staff study summarized testimony showing about $1 billion of these costs over 22 years. The State Department has acknowledged most of that. The one significant area in dispute is the possible $220 million payment to Panama for the so-called contingent payment of $10 million per year if earned. The State Department asserts the United States would not have to pay this payment if it has accumulated by 2000 A.D., but presents no hard evidence to support its position. The testimony showed that while the U.S. Government may feel this money will not have to be paid, many Panamanians expect that it will be paid.

It will be paid to them, or to their government, during the intervening time of these 22 years.

On that one single point of the $10 million per year if earned, that would constitute only $220 million of this estimated payment that would have to be made of around $1 billion.

WILL THE TREATIES BRING ABOUT U.S.-PANAMANIAN DISCORD?

Finally, the committee staff study showed seven major areas of "potential financial controversy between the United States and Panama."

These seven areas have been very carefully examined, and they are believed to be a very reasonable estimate and a very reasonable area of operations in defense and all that will bring this about.

The study says:

The significance of these points of conflict is that serious and continuing disagreement over ambiguous financial issues may not bring about the period of friendly cooperation with Panama envisioned by the Administration.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I urge each Senator to read both the committee staff study and the State Department comments on the financial issues and reach his own conclusion as to how much these treaties will cost the United States. I, for one, think the U.S. taxpayer should be prepared for a bill which, if things go wrong, could total as much as $2 billion. This figure does not count the roughly $1 billion book value of facilities that will be turned over to Panama if these treaties are ratified.

That is not intended to charge anyone with bad faith. This is a reference to seven possible areas of disagreement, the lack of uniform interpretation, and the lack of some conclusions by the contracting parties—and this is a contract that concerns money matters. These seven areas are fully set forth in this study that I am going to ask to be printed in the Record.

Mr. President, I say again for emphasis that this study could not possibly be made between the time we had the hearing and when we thought we should file something with the Senate. The staff, a highly competent group, has worked on it day and night and have come up with these calculations. The enumeration of these seven matters and the reasons therefor are set forth, as I said, in the staff study that I have asked to be included in the Record.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I urge that each Senator read and study both the committee staff study and the State Department comments on the financial issues and then reach his own conclusions as to how much these treaties will cost the U.S. Treasury. I, for one, think the U.S. taxpayers will be charged a bill which, if things go wrong, could total as much as $2 billion. That figure does not count the roughly $1 billion book value of facilities that will be turned over to Panama if these treaties are ratified.

The $2 billion to which I refer is new money. That is a forthcoming event. It is going to have to be paid, according to our calculations, out of the Treasury.

The second item of the $1 billion is the rough book value now after the writeoff of the cost of the canal and other facilities. There is still left facilities with a book value of $1 billion which goes along with the treaty as part of the bargain. That would make a total of $3 billion of money cost.

This last item of $1 billion actually has a replacement value. If it were going to have to be built or replaced, today it would cost over $9 billion. That shows what we are dealing with. It is something which cannot cavalierly be dismissed or taken for granted, or laughed about.

Somewhere, sometime, someone has to begin discussing more seriously the cost, not only of items of this kind, which are a continuing series, but all costs.

I also urge each of my colleagues make a judgment as to whether or not these financial questions will undermine, or have a tendency to undermine, United States-Panamanian relations in the future.

Certainly, that question is relevant. We are all concerned, to some degree, about these relations. Whatever we do, if we should adopt this treaty, let us not have a built-in situation which would lead to real controversies over and over again.

In my opinion, if we are not prepared with a blank check to underwrite both the potential operating losses and the current cost of these treaties we should reject the treaties rather than create 22 years of unknowns—unknown as to amounts and unknown as to possible costs—and discord and controversy with Panama.

It is another way of saying that a better job—I say that with all deference—could be done on this question. Ultimately, each Member must decide how important these disturbing financial questions are in arriving at a balanced judgment on the risks and benefits of the proposed treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this study by the staff of the Senate Armed Services Committee, to which I have given my personal attention, together with their sheets of figures, and also a transmittal of this to the State Department and the State Department's statement in response, be printed in the record at this point. With all that done, then the public and the membership will have the complete story of what we found in the committee.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the record, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES STAFF STUDY ON PANAMA CANAL FINANCIAL DATA

At the request of the Chairman, the Committee staff prepared for the use of Committee Members this summary and analysis of the various financial data presented in testimony and developed by the Panama Canal Company. Without detailed implementing legislation or a full-cost analysis of the treaties by the Administration it is not possible to provide more than approximations of possible costs to the U.S. government.

A summary of these figures is included as Attachment A.

POTENTIAL PANAMA CANAL OPERATING LOSS

This is the single most difficult part of the financial analysis. The testimony of both Governor Parfitt and Mr. Staats indicated a substantial possibility that the Panama Canal Commission under the treaties would not be self-sustaining after the first few years—i.e., would suffer operating losses during the life of the treaty. The Canal Zone Governor testified that he thought such operating losses would become a liability of the U.S. government.

Can tolls be raised enough to cover increased costs?

The key judgment that must be made on whether there will be operating losses is how much tolls can be raised to cover Canal operating costs plus the payments to Panama required by the treaties.

There is a great deal of uncertainty on this point. The recent study prepared for the State Department and Panama Canal Company by International Research Associates, Inc. says:

"* * * unlike most other enterprises, the Canal Company has only limited economic freedom to pass through any cost increases which it experiences to its customers * * * there is evidence that in the past the cost of alternatives has often gone down while the cost of operating the Canal has increased. * * * The relationship of toll sensitivity to inflation would not be an important issue if the difference between current toll revenues and the cost of alternatives to users were large (200 or 300 percent) * * * the maximum attainable toll revenue, is only 40 percent greater than the revenue projected under current toll rates * * * the eventual elimination of this user surplus must be viewed as a distinct possibility. The practical consequence of such an event would be the termination of the economic life of the Panama Canal on a toll revenue supporting basis. * * *

* * * the maximum toll revenue currently attainable is some 40 percent greater than the revenue projected without a toll increase * * * attainment of the maximum revenue requires a toll rate increase of somewhere between 75 and 100 percent. * * *

The future sensitivity of traffic to toll increase will be determined largely by the relationship of future cost of Panama Canal transits to future cost alternatives. And that relationship will be influenced primarily by: (a) the force and direction of future inflation rates; and (b) the future value of the U.S. Dollar vs. other currencies. * * * a high rate of inflation even if combined with continued devaluation of the U.S. Dollar would, on balance, constitute a greater damage to the Canal's ability to raise sufficient tolls than low or moderate inflation. * * * a low to moderate area of inflation of around 3 percent per year should permit the stabilization of the cost of Canal operation. * * * Under such circumstances, the prospects for maintaining the Canal operating on a financially self-supporting basis would undoubtedly be better."

Similarly, the American Management Systems study prepared for the Armed Services Committee stated in regard to toll increases: "Only in recent years has the problem of forecasting Canal toll revenues become critical to the Canal's financial health. The Canal has almost always been able to break even—mostly because Canal traffic was increasing faster than the costs to operate and maintain the Canal. However, Canal traffic has now decreased by 6 percent per year in the last three years. * * * Since the Canal is now (even without the proposed treaty) operating in an economic environment wherein costs are inflating rapidly and traffic growth may have ceased, this problem of forecasting toll revenues is critical for the Canal's managers. * * * There is large uncertainty in the level of Canal toll revenues over the next two decades. * * * This large uncertainty in likely revenues is inherent and probably irreducible. * * * The level of Panama Canal traffic and toll revenues will depend upon a number of factors, most of which are unpredictable and outside the control of the Panama Canal Commission."

Can operating costs be reduced?

Another judgment that must be made in determining whether the Canal will be financially self-sustaining is whether the costs of running the Canal can be cut below the estimates of the Panama Canal Company. The American Management Systems study suggested it might be possible to cut Canal operating costs by $30-40 million per year, largely through personnel cuts. This is about an 18 percent reduction from the Panama Canal Company's estimate of operating expenses. On this point Governor Parfitt testified,

"I find it very difficult indeed to see the savings that are contemplated here and still run an efficient and effective organization * * * I personally don't believe that there are that many savings that could be implemented with any degree of confidence and still have an efficiently running canal in the fashion we have now."

Mr. Staats testified:

"It sounds like a fairly sizable reduction considering all that has been done to try to cut the costs down there * * * we feel the Panama Canal is conservative, or too conservative, to be quite accurate about it, on their capital investment estimates."

Assumptions behind illustrative deficit estimates

In order to illustrate the magnitude of the potential deficit, the Panama Canal Company was requested to calculate the potential deficit assuming 6 percent inflation per year and assuming no increase in tolls above current levels. They were also asked to calculate the cumulative toll increases required to eliminate all deficits. As a middle case, they were asked to make the same calculations assuming arbitrarily that tolls could only be increased 75 percent cumulatively for the period of the treaties and that there was no reduction in traffic caused by the toll increases beyond the first 20 percent increase. Since there is a great uncertainty about how much North Slope oil will be shipped through the Canal, each case was calculated first with the current estimate of potential North Slope oil shipments through the Canal and then again with a 75 percent reduction of that estimate after 1980. All estimates include current Panama Canal Company estimates of operating costs.

It is important to note that none of the figures shown below include the $10 million annual contingent payment to Panama, the $20 million annual interest payment to the U.S. Treasury, possible recovery of U.S. capital investment in the Canal or other costs described in other sections of this study. If these costs were included in the figures shown below, they would add to the potential losses:

ILLUSTRATIONS OF POTENTIAL PANAMA CANAL OPERATING DEFICITS (CUMULATIVE THROUGH 1999 A.D.—ASSUMING 6 PERCENT ANNUAL INFLATION)

If tolls are not increased above current rates (loss)	$3.57	$3.75
If tolls are raised only 75 percent (the total currently available increase estimated to produce maximum revenue was 75-100 percent) (loss)99	1.16
Cumulative toll increase needed to fully offset deficits (assuming no toll-caused traffic loss after first 20 percent toll increase) (percent)	+149	+168

² 75 percent loss of North Slope oil after 1980 (billions).

Who pays for toll increases?

It is well to keep in mind that toll increases over the life of the Treaties will mean additional costs to be paid by shippers and consumers around the world. How large will such a burden be? In relative terms, as Mr. Staats pointed out in testimony, not large. But the amounts are still substantial in dollar terms. Using figures provided by the Panama Canal Company, and assuming 6% inflation, substantial North Slope oil traffic after 1980, and no surplus or interest payment, the additional toll revenue the Canal would have to bring in during the life of the treaty (assuming now that tolls could be raised by these levels) would be $3.57 billion. If tolls could be increased that much, the Company estimates that approximately one-third of this increased charge would be borne by U.S. shippers and consumers in the form of higher costs. That amounts to an additional cost of $1.2 billion.

ESTIMATED VALUE OF ASSETS TRANSFERRED TO PANAMA

One aspect of the costs of the Treaties is the value of the property given to Panama over the life of the treaty. The testimony and other information provided by the executive branch indicates two types of estimates of this value. Governor Parfitt, Mr. Staats and the Defense Department put the net book value of all assets in the Canal Zone at $920 million. Mr. Staats suggested that the Congress consider whether some of the book value of these assets should be recovered through accelerated depreciation charges against Canal operations over the life of the treaty.

The witnesses also presented estimates of the current value or replacement cost of the assets in the Canal Zone—though it is not a very precise figure. The State Department's composite estimate of replacement value is $9.8 billion, including the Canal itself, the Company, and military assets.

POTENTIAL COST TO U.S. FOR ITEMS NOT COVERED BY TOLLS

A second aspect of the cost of the treaties is the total cost to be paid directly by the U.S. as a result of the treaty and over the life of the treaty. These items are not now costs of the Panama Canal Commission, and therefore would not be recovered through higher tolls. Any effort to recover them through higher tolls would, of course, increase the estimates of deficits outlined in the first section of this study.

1. Military Plant Relocation Cost—General McAuliffe testified that the various transfers and changes in facilities necessitated by the Treaties would involve substantial costs for relocating military units and building new quarters as needed. He estimated these costs at $43 million.

2. Civil Service Early Retirement—Mr. Staats and AMS concluded that the additional early retirement costs for Panama Canal Commission employees given the opportunity to retire early under the treaty would total between $7.5 million and $8.4 million per year. Mr. Staats estimated the total cost to the Civil Service Commission at $135 million over the 22 years.

3. Incremental Cost for DoD Schools and Hospitals—The Treaty prohibits the Commission from running schools or hospitals as is done now by the Panama Canal Company. These functions will be transferred to the Department of Defense. Reimbursement for these costs by users is not presently on a full-cost basis in the Department of Defense and additional costs for the transferred personnel might also be incurred. AMS estimated the costs at about $5 million per year, or $110 million over the life of the treaty, though they could be higher.

4. Foregone Interest Payment to the Treasury—The Panama Canal Code now requires the Company to pay interest to the U.S. Treasury on the net interest-bearing investment of the United States in the Canal. The Administration proposes to omit the payment (currently $20 million per year) under the Treaties. Since the interest rate will rise over the years, the total loss to the Treasury was estimated by Mr. Staats at $505 million over the life of the treaty.

5. Contingent Payment to Panama—The treaty contains a $10 million annual payment to Panama that is incurred only to the extent that a surplus is earned. Governor Parfitt testified that the payment will not be included in the base of costs used to determine tolls, and that therefore it is unlikely that it will ever be earned. The Treaty provides that the payment, if not paid in a given year, carries over to succeeding years. It also provides that the U.S. must turn over the Canal free of liens and debts. Both Governor Parfitt and Mr. Staats pointed out that the Treaty is silent as to whether any accumulated amounts existing on December 31, 1999, must be paid out of the U.S. Treasury. Governor Parfitt testified that the Panamanians apparently feel it will be paid by the U.S. while the Administration asserts that it is simply extinguished in the year 2000 because the surplus was never earned. If the annual payment is never made during the life of the Treaty and must be paid at the end of the treaty, it could amount to a liability of $220 million in the year 2000.

6. Foregone Payment Due From Panama—Panama presently owes the Company some $8 million for past services, primarily utilities. If that payment is foregone, there is an additional cost of $8 million.

7. Cost of Inventory and Evaluation of Assets—Mr. Staats testified that it will be necessary to do a complete inventory of the assets owned by the U.S. in the Canal Zone in preparation for implementation of the Treaties. He estimated that this complex process will cost $2 million.

8. Other Costs—Mr. Staats also identified possible costs in the payment of accrued leave to employees separated under the Treaties, though he could not estimate the amount. AMS identified possible additional costs in greater training efforts than those presently planned by the Commission, but could not quantify them. There may also be undiscovered costs borne by other agencies of the Government in implementing the Treaties.

OTHER POSSIBLE LIABILITIES OUTSIDE THE TREATIES

The United States and Panama also have exchanged notes regarding a military and civilian aid package to Panama which is related to the Treaties but not technically dependent upon them. These consist of Foreign Military Assistance Credits, Agency for International Development Housing Guarantees, Export-Import Bank Credits, and an Overseas Private Investment Corporation loan guarantee. Should Panama, which already pays 37 percent of its total income to service large foreign debts, fail to repay these amounts, totaling $345 million, the United States could become liable to make good these losses.

POTENTIAL AREAS FOR U.S.-PANAMANIAN FINANCIAL CONTROVERSY

During the hearings, and in the analysis made by AMS, a number of potentially serious ambiguities in treaty language, problems in implementing various treaty provisions, or instances where the interests of the U.S. and Panama on financial questions would be diametrically opposed, were pointed out. These are summarized below.

1. $.30 per ton payment to Panama—Gives Panama a motive to keep tolls low to keep traffic high. To avoid deficits, U.S. canal managers would be motivated to do just the opposite.

2. $.30 per ton and fixed $10 million payments—Not clear what kind of priority they have in deficit year. In the event of a deficit, would Panama not be paid or would U.S. pay these treaty costs?

3. $10 million surplus payment—Not clear how it should be calculated. Not clear how to handle deficit from a past year. Disagreement as to whether the total carryover obligation must be paid by the United States in 2000. Disagreement as to whether this should be included in the toll base.

4. Interest payment to the Treaty—Panama may oppose because it increases Commission's costs, sending tolls up and making profit less likely. But Congress may insist on it.

5. $10 million for services—Panama will want to see it increased for inflation. U.S. will want to see it decreased because of lower Panamanian labor costs. In addition, many of these services will be provided to U.S. employees (fire, police, etc.) but there is not agreement on standards for the quality of service.

6. Depreciation—If Commission tries to increase depreciation expense or create new reserve for capital improvements, Panama will object because it will increase costs, push up tolls, and make it less likely that they will get the surplus $10 million.

7. Toll Setting—Panama may want to keep tolls as low as possible to keep traffic high, since their annuity payment is based largely on traffic, not revenues. The U.S. may be under pressures to increase tolls regularly to avoid deficits.

The significance of these points of conflict is that serious and continuing disagreement over ambiguous financial issues may not bring about the period of friendly cooperation with Panama envisioned by the Administration. Continual disagreements about whether there has been a surplus, whether depreciation is unreasonably high, or whether tolls should be raised a given amount, have the potential for souring the relationship between the parties. This is particularly true when one considers the evenly divided Committees set up by the Treaties that will advise on policy, and the fact that the Commission's Board has a slim 5-4 American majority. Many of these potential points of friction could be removed by clear written understandings between the parties prior to ratification, as recommended in testimony by Governor Parfitt.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C.

HON. JOHN C. STENNIS,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letter of February 9 and for the opportunity to comment on the "Staff Study on Panama Canal Financial Data." I am pleased to provide the enclosed memorandum setting forth the Department's comments, with which the Department of Defense concurs, on each of the five sections of the study.

I am also enclosing a series of questions and answers on the economic implications of the Treaties which was sent to the Senate on February 10 by Secretary Brown, Secretary Alexander and me.

Sincerely,

CYRUS VANCE.

MEMORANDUM COMMENTING ON "STAFF STUDY ON PANAMA CANAL FINANCIAL DATA"

OPERATING LOSS

Based on all available studies, we believe revenues will be sufficient to meet expenditures, including the payments to be made to Panama under the new treaties.

The best available information on Panama Canal revenue shows that a 25 percent toll increase would yield $243 million in FY 1980 and $248 million in FY 1983. A 30 percent rate increase would yield $250 million and $254 million for those two years respectively. Meanwhile, Canal cash requirements, which include payments to Panama and the effects of inflation, would range between $238 million to $247 million in 1980 and between $237 million and $262 million in 1983. (The American Management Services study prepared for your Committee suggests that larger cost reductions than those envisioned by the Panama Canal Company could be made under the new Treaty, thereby reducing cash requirements. The Panama Canal Company will evaluate the recommendations of the AMS Study to determine the feasibility of the proposed reductions and will continue to search for ways to reduce cost while maintaining the highest level of efficiency). Our studies indicate that even larger toll increases could be applied if necessary, to produce additional revenues. While the range of uncertainty increases for the later years of the Treaty period, we believe it is reasonable to expect that the Canal enterprise can continue to meet all its operating costs, including payments to Panama required by the Treaty. The Committee's staff study converts uncertainties about the future into a precise numerical projection of "potential losses" whereas these uncertainties could also end up being beneficial to the Canal.

With regard to the effect of inflation on increased toll rates, the staff study quotes a recent analysis prepared by International Research Associates as follows: "The maximum attainable revenue was approximately 40 percent greater than the projected revenue without a toll increase . . . and . . . the attainment of that revenue would require a toll increase in the range between 75 percent to 100 percent." The staff study then applies an inflation rate of 6 percent per annum to Canal expenditures to the year 2000 and concludes that a substantial deficit could result. However, a 6 percent rate of inflation would affect the price of competitive transportation systems as well, thus permitting further canal toll increases in the future. When the staff study assumes that the maximum toll revenue available during the life of the treaty is 40 percent above current rates, it distorts the conclusion of the IRA study which indicates that the maximum attainable revenue, as calculated, is based on the current relationship of transit costs and the costs of alternatives. The IRA analysis does not imply that a 75 percent to 100 percent toll rate increase, producing a 40 percent increase in toll revenue, is all that can be derived for the rest of the century.

According to a January 1978 study by Arthur Anderson & Co., a one-time toll increase of 19-27 percent at the beginning of the initial five-year period would cover all costs of operation, including payments to Panama and inflation in operating costs for that period. The Panama Canal Company has estimated that a cumulative increase of 29 percent would be necessary for the period through 1983 under the treaty, and that a cumulative increase of 20 percent for the period 1981-1984 would be necessary even without a new treaty to offset inflation. The impact of the initial toll increase on U.S. consumers and shippers should not exceed $15 million per year; it would involve a transportation cost increase of less than 1 percent, and its overall effect on our $2 trillion economy would be negligible.

ESTIMATED VALUE OF ASSETS TRANSFERRED TO PANAMA

The net book value of existing Canal Company and Canal Zone Government property to be transferred to Panama by the terms of the Canal Treaty is $194 million. Panama would also receive capital improvements to the Canal and its facilities made during the Treaty's lifetime which the Canal Company, based on planned capital improvements, currently estimates at $454 million. The approximate total acquisition and improvement cost of military facilities as of FY 1978 to be turned over to Panama by the end of the treaty is estimated to be $352.9 million. However, the true value of the Canal and its related assets cannot be measured in terms of financial investments which would be worthless to us if we could not continue to use the Canal. The true value to the United States is best measured in terms of both past benefits and our ability to continue to use the waterway which the new treaties guarantee.

POTENTIAL COST FOR ITEMS NOT COVERED BY TOLLS

Payments to Panama under the Panama Canal Treaties will be made from Canal revenues, not tax dollars. Moreover, all operating expenses of the new entity will be paid from Canal revenues. This would include for example, the cost of conducting inventories of the Panama Canal enterprise as a result of the treaty. The staff study incorrectly concludes that the costs of such inventories would be drawn from the general fund of the Treasury.

Administration spokesmen have testified on several occasions before Congressional Committees that the transition from our present role to our proposed role under the new Treaties would entail some costs in the U.S. budget. One major cost would be relocation of Defense installations, estimated at $43 million for the first three years. Another would be an early retirement program for Canal enterprise and certain other employees. The Treaty provides for an optional early retirement program as an employee security assurance for Canal enterprise employees. The design of the program, however, will be at U.S. discretion. The programs which have been considered within the Administration range in cost up to $150 million (current value). There will be additional DOD costs resulting from a merger of the Canal Company and DOD activities, and assumption of any non-reimbursable costs for health, education and other support functions. In the letter to Senators from Secretaries Vance, Brown and Alexander of February 10th it was noted the total appropriations impact over 21 years based on present information is unlikely to be much more than $350 million. The Executive Branch is now developing detailed estimated costs for these functions. None of the appropriated funds for these costs would be for the benefit of the Government of Panama.

In any event, the items in this portion of the staff study will be subject to review by the Armed Services Committee, and precise estimates must await Congressional action on enabling legislation. Few, if any, of the other costs cited by Mr. Staats on page 8 of the staff study will be funded out of appropriated funds. Payment of accrued leave, for example, to separated PCC/CZG employees will be borne by the Commission as would any increased training costs. Only the few DOD employees who may be separated as a result of the treaty will receive payment of accrued leave from DOD. In addition, DOD will be responsible for future payments of accrued leave for those PCC/CZG employees who transfer to DOD. Possible other costs which cannot now be identified will depend in large measure on the outcome of the implementing legislation and its requirements.

OTHER POSSIBLE LIABILITIES OUTSIDE THE TREATIES

A separate economic and military cooperation package of $345 million—all in repayable loans, credits or guarantees—is planned. This package depends on development of programs to meet existing Congressionally established criteria. Only about $5 million in appropriated funds would be required to support repayment guarantees for the military credit program as a reserve fund; none would be paid to Panama. The staff study incorrectly assumes that debts currently owed the Panama Canal enterprise will be foregone by the United States. The treaty does not affect in any way the status of any liability owed the United States by Panama. Under the proposed legislation, we would expect that the Panama Canal Commission would succeed to all accounts receivable of the current enterprise, including amounts owed it by Panama. We intend to settle these debts with Panama as expeditiously as possible.

Although not required by the Treaty, the Administration will recommend that the Treasury cease collecting annual interest payments from the Canal Company which have been paid since 1951 and which are currently averaging $18–$20 million. It will be up to Congress to decide whether to accept the Administration's recommendation.

AREAS OF POLITICAL CONTROVERSY

The staff study alludes to some areas of the new treaties which it suggests might result in controversy between the United States and Panama. The study suggests that the major item of controversy would be the contingent payment to Panama under Article XIII (4)(c) of the new treaty. The contingent payment will not be figured in the calculation of the toll base. This contingent payment is payable only if operating revenues produce a surplus over expenditures, which include among others the variable annuity due Panama of $.30 per Canal ton and the fixed annuity of $10 million.

If the surplus is insufficient to cover the entire payment of the contingent annuity, the shortfall is carried over to succeeding years. Since payment is contingent on available surpluses, the United States is not obligated to pay off on any accumulated unpaid balance in the year 2000. Panama's negotiators have acknowledged this fact.

As for depreciation, there does not appear to be a reasonable basis for the staff study observation that Panama may object should the Commission decide either to increase depreciation costs or create a new reserve for capital improvements on the ground that such actions would make it less likely that Panama would get the contingent $10 million.

It is clearly understood that capital improvement and replacement costs, whether accounted for by depreciation, a capital reserve fund, or another proper accounting formula, would constitute expenditures of the Commission. These expenditures would be deducted from revenues prior to determining the amount of any surplus for purposes of the $10 million contingent payment.

In addition to the foregoing comments on specific issues raised by the staff study, we would like to offer our overall judgment that:

Canal operating revenues under the new Panama Canal Treaty are expected to meet all Canal operating expenditures.

Payments to Panama can and will be made from Canal revenues, not tax dollars. The likely toll increases associated with the new Treaty will have a minimal impact on our trade and economy.

Insofar as can presently be determined, the costs of the new Treaty to be funded by the Treasury are unlikely to be much more than $350 million, as previously indicated in the letter to the Senate from Secretaries Vance, Brown and Alexander of February 10. The Executive Branch is now developing detailed budget estimates for the non-reimbursable functions which DOD will assume under the Treaty.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES—STAFF STUDY ON PANAMA CANAL FINANCIAL DATA, ADDITIONAL COMMENTS ON STATE DEPARTMENT MEMORANDUM

1. Potential Panama Canal Operating Loss—The key question is whether or not revenues will be sufficient to meet expenditures, including the payments to be made to Panama under the treaty. If the Canal operates at a net loss over the 22 years of the treaty, the State Department comments do not deny that the U.S. Government would have to pay the loss in order to turn the Canal over to Panama debt-free in 2000 A.D.

Witnesses testified that the Canal's financial prospects are uncertain and that there was a substantial possibility that the Canal would suffer operating losses during the life of the treaty beginning about 1983-84. The State Department/Panama Canal Company study of possible toll increases shows that there is a distinct downside risk that the Canal will not be self-sustaining. The Committee staff study merely illustrates the potential magnitude of that downside risk, depending on how much one believes tolls could be increased.

The State Department comments on the Committee staff study agree on the uncertainty, but assert that "revenues will be sufficient to meet expenditures". There is no evidence for this assertion beyond 1983. The staff study estimates potential losses that might occur after that time while the State Department makes no estimates after 1983. The figures used in the State Department comments are consistent with the figures used in the Committee staff study through 1983.

The State Department's assertion that a 19-27 percent initial toll increase would be sufficient assumes that no additional costs—such as the interest payment to the U.S. and the contingent payment to Panama—will be imposed. If these two items were included, the initial toll increase required would be 40 percent, according to testimony.

There is one factual error in the State comments—that the maximum toll revenue assumed by the Committee staff study was 40 percent above current rates and that this was a distortion. The staff study used in the Committee staff study illustrates the potential deficit if toll rates could be increased 75 percent above current rates over the treaty period; revenues were assumed to increase at about the same rate.

2. Estimated Value of Assets Transferred to Panama—The State Department comments used a future book value of $1001 million for assets to be transferred to Panama. This compares to a current book value of $920 million shown in the Committee staff study from testimony.

3. Potential Cost to U.S. for Items Not Covered by Tolls—The memorandum seems generally to confirm the Committee staff study figures. It estimates the total of early retirement, DoD construction and other DoD costs at about $350 million, $62 million more than shown in the staff study. The memorandum concedes that the Treasury would lose $20 million per year in interest payments if its recommendations are approved, but does not include that figure in its point on "costs" at the end of page 6. It asserts that Panama does not expect to be paid in the year 2000 for unpaid surplus payments but offers no evidence to support the assertion.

4. Other Possible Liabilities Outside the Treaties—The State memorandum does not dispute the point that the loans and guarantees would become liabilities of the United States if Panama fails to repay them.

5. Areas of Potential Controversy—The State memorandum discusses only parts of two of the seven major areas of potential controversy outlined on page 9 of the Committee staff study. It does not dispute the fundamental point that there are financial aspects of the treaties that could lead to U.S.-Panamanian controversy.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes, I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I commend the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Armed Services for his statement today. I feel that the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. Stennis) has rendered a very important service to the Members of the Senate and to the American people. The facts which the Senator from Mississippi has presented to the Senate today, dealing with the costs of the proposed treaties, are facts that the American people need to carefully ponder. We are dealing with huge sums of money. This money must come from the pockets of the American working people. The Senator from Mississippi brought out that the depreciated book value of the U.S.-owned property in Panama equals almost $1 billion and that the replacement value of the property proposed to be given to Panama exceeds $9 billion. That $9 billion of replacement cost is property that is owned collectively, at the present time, by the American people. If these treaties are approved, that property will be given to the Republic of Panama.

Maybe that is what the country wants done. The property belongs to the people of our country, and if the people of our country wish to give that property away, the people have the right to do so. But I think that, before doing that, it is important that the public know just how many dollars are involved in the transaction.

Another vitally important point which the Senator from Mississippi pointed out deals with the question of tolls. I must say that I was surprised at some of the figures developed by the able Senator from Mississippi. As he mentioned, there ultimately will be some limit as to how much the tolls can be raised and still attract adequate business to finance the operation of the Panama Canal. In that connection, Ambassador Linowitz already has admitted that, as a beginning, the tolls must be increased some 25 to 30 percent.

Mr. STENNIS. Right.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The able Senator from Mississippi pointed out that, under certain conditions, it would be necessary to increase the tolls by a figure of some 148 to 163 percent, if I remember the figures correctly, which is a tremendous increase in tolls.

Who will pay for that? The American consumer, for the most part, will pay that huge increase in tolls.

The Senator from Mississippi also mentioned the implementing legislation which will be required, but which has not yet been sent to Congress. On September 29, 1977, Mr. Herbert J. Hansell, legal advisor to the Department of State, testified before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. I want to quote just a paragraph or two from Mr. Hansell's testimony. Bearing in mind that Mr. Hansell is the legal advisor to the State Department, he told the Foreign Relations Committee this:

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have this opportunity to report to this committee on the proposed legislation to implement these treaties that is being prepared for submission to Congress in the near future. That legislation, of course, will be an essential component of the overall program of implementation of the treaties.

For emphasis, I repeat Mr. Hansell's statement to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations:

That legislation, of course—

Namely, the implementing legislation—will be an essential component of the overall program of implementation of the treaties.

Yet I say to the Senate that that essential component has not yet been submitted to Congress. The treaties have been debated for—this is the second week the treaties have been debated. Yet that legislation has not yet been submitted to Congress so that Congress might be in a position to consider what will be required if the treaties are ratified.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. In just a moment.

Mr. Hansell, on that same day before the Foreign Relations Committee, said this:

We hope to have a complete draft available for submission to both Houses of Congress within several weeks. We have been at work on it for some period of time. Certainly well before the end of October, we expect to have it to you.

But October has come and gone; November has come and gone; December has come and gone; January has come and gone; February has come and, by next week, will be gone. Let that implementing legislation, which the legal advisor to the State Department says is an essential component, has not yet been presented to the Congress.

I yield.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished Senator from Virginia, my good friend, if, perhaps, we are going into an area that really does not affect the ratification of the treaties. The question of implementing legislation, whatever is needed, would that not be a separate matter for consideration of both the House and the Senate?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It will be considered separately, of course, from the treaties.

Mr. LEAHY. And would be considered by both bodies, unlike the treaty, which is considered only by the Senate?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is correct. But the legal advisor to the State Department says that that legislation is an essential component to the implementation of the treaties. He also promised to have that information available to Congress last October.

Mr. LEAHY. But with all due respect to the legal advisers at the State Department, is the question not what is essential nature, or its applicability, one that will be decided within the Senate, within the other body, and not by the State Department or anybody at the executive level?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Partially, what the Senator says is correct. But the executive level plans to submit the implementing legislation to the Congress, and I do not think anyone denies, certainly the State Department does not, that it is a very important consideration in regard to the treaties and, certainly, that information should be available.

Mr. LEAHY. But is it not a fact that the implementing legislation should be looked at by the House of Representatives and then if it requires any kind of appropriation it would have to begin in the House of Representatives and is something that can be worked on, amended, changed, accepted or rejected in the wisdom of a majority number of Members of either body?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is the only way it can be done.

Mr. LEAHY. Yes.

Is that not really an entirely different situation than the treaty which is going to require 50 percent plus one for amendment and two-thirds for ratification within this body alone?

Is it not really stretching the situation somewhat to even suggest that our consideration of the ratification of these treaties is contin-gent upon consideration of implementing legislation insofar as we can either accept, reject, modify, change, or do anything we want with any implementing legislation, whether it originates from the executive branch of the Government, whether it originates from any Members of the Congress?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I agree with the State Department. I think it is a very essential part of the basic problem if these treaties are ratified without knowing what will be required in the way of implementing legislation. Then I can foresee what the Congress will be faced with.

The Congress will be faced with those who favor the treaties saying, "Oh, well, Congress must approve these pieces of implementing legislation because you have already approved the treaties. If the treaties haven't been approved, this is what is required."

So as the able Senator from Mississippi began his remarks, the Congress and the Senate would be buying a pig in a poke by approving these treaties without knowing what will be required in the way of implementing legislation.

Mr. LEAHY. But if I could pursue this a bit further with the distinguished Senator, and I realize that I stand to ask questions of not only two good friends in the Senate, but two gentlemen with far greater seniority and who have considered such matters in far greater depth, but, notwithstanding, it is my understanding that the treaties rise or fall on their own merits and implementing legislation would not be acted upon by the Congress, in any event, unless and until the treaties were ratified, and would also rise or fall on its own merit.

Would the distinguished Senator from Virginia feel that he was bound, assuming that these treaties are ratified, was therefore bound to vote lock, stock, and barrel for any implementing legislation that might come up from the State Department or from the White House?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia certainly would not be bound, but the Senator from Virginia is a little more independent than the State Department and some of the——

Mr. LEAHY. I think my own voting record will show I have been independent of the State Department and the executive branch on numerous occasions.

Certainly, the Senator from Vermont already announced his support for these treaties and would not feel in any way bound, having voted for them, assuming they are ratified, if that is the only way implementing legislation will ever come before the House or the Senate, but assuming they are ratified and assuming implementing legislation which must rise or fall on its own merits, separate from the treaties, assuming it comes here, as it may, would not feel bound one way or the other on such implementing legislation.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I commend the Senator.

Mr. LEAHY. And I suspect that will be the feeling of the vast majority of the Senators in this body, that no matter whether he voted for or against ratification of the treaties, that we still have to exercise our independent judgment, just as the House of Representatives has to exercise its independent judgment on implementing legislation.

Considering that factor and considering, second, that the implementing legislation only can be before Congress unless and until the treaties are ratified, I would hope that my colleagues in the Senate would not feel that they must delay from consideration of the merits of these treaties, whatever amendments might be offered, because of lack of any implementing legislation.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I hate to intervene. May I ask who has the floor?

Mr. LEAHY. I have made my point.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. STENNIS. We enjoy the debate here of these gentlemen, but I am under an obligation to get into another matter shortly.

Mr. LEAHY. I thank the distinguished Senator for giving me the time.

Mr. STENNIS. That is all right. I listened to every word that was said.

Had the Senator from Virginia concluded?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes. I thank the Senator.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator very much for his remarks and for his help in planning these hearings and his consultation over the period of years.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield for half a minute?

Mr. STENNIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I want to emphasize in regard to this implementing legislation that the State Department considered it very important last September and promised the Congress, promised the Foreign Relations Committee, to make this legislation available to the Congress not later than October of last year.

So I think it is a vitally important consideration that must be taken, a matter that must be taken, into consideration in dealing with these treaties.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator from Virginia is correct on that point, I think.

True, they are separate matters and passed as separate pieces of legislation. True, the House also passes on them. A revelation of them now would be very revealing, particularly with regard to the unknowns about this proposed treaty. It would be a guideline. It would be an identification mark. It would be like a tag on a piece of baggage. You can tell where it is going by its own marks.

I am glad to yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. May I join with the Senator from Virginia (Mr. Harry F. Byrd, Jr.) in commending the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. Stennis) for the contribution he made here.

I have been on this floor countless hours as one of the managers in opposition. What the Senator has offered here in the last several minutes has been very meaningful insofar as the debate is concerned from two standpoints.

It has been represented here on the floor and throughout the country by those in support of this treaty that this is not going to cost the taxpayers any money. It is clear from the inquiry made by the Senator's committee that that simply is not the case. It is going to cost us a substantial amount of taxpayers' money, ranging up to $2 billion, and until the Senator's committee saw fit to inquire into these matters, these were matters that were known only to a few and not even to many of us who have been working on this for the last several months.

I would say that alone is a tremendous contribution to the debate.

Second, the Senator indicated that the financial misunderstandings which may arise from the terms of the present treaty may be substantial, as much as seven major areas.

That is terribly important for our consideration here. There has been reference again, time after time, to a festering sore in Panama which must be healed and, apparently, this treaty would heal all and we would enter into a period of relationship which would be all roses and honey.

It is our contention that this treaty may open up other sores, other festering sores, which, rather than help the situation, may harm it.

So, Mr. President, we are indebted to the Senator for this contribution.

I might point out this. I am looking forward to his further presentation in connection with the security implications, which is a prime function of the Armed Services Committee, on which he serves in such a distinguished fashion and has for so many years.

Mr. STENNIS. I certainly thank the Senator very much for his remarks and for his work on this same subject matter.

I especially thank all members of our Armed Services Committee. Those that may wind up supporting the treaty were concerned and anxious and cooperated on these matters. All members of our committee really worked hard on this matter. I thank the staff, also, for what I consider some excellent work.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the discussion about the implementing legislation, and I certainly agree with the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Virginia as to the importance of having that legislation prior to the final consideration of these treaties.

I point out to the Senator from Vermont that the reason for the long delay—the delay, incidentally, has taken place on the side of the State Department—is that there is not agreement on what should be in the implementing legislation. It is this difference of agreement and concern about what is in it that adds to its importance.

I believe that it is very vital that the implementing legislation be available to this body so that the Senate knows just what the administration's approach is to implementing the treaty, before the treaty is finally considered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I should like to answer that, if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LEAHY. I understand what the Senator from Oklahoma is saying. However, it is still the position of the Senator from Vermont that the implementing legislation has to rise or fall on its own merits, No. 1.

No. 2, it does not even come before Congress unless or until the treaties are ratified.

No. 3, it falls into an entirely different kind of category. It has to go to both the House of Representatives and the Senate. Then, if it carries any kind of appropriation—and that has been discussed back and forth—it must originate in the House of Representatives.

I cannot believe, and I doubt if any Member of the Senate can believe, that in whatever form implementing legislation might come up, it is going to come here, to the U.S. Senate, in absolute pristine form, precisely as it might leave the State Department. If it has to go through the House of Representatives first, I just cannot imagine that it is going to come here with every word the same, every line the same, the crossing of every "t," the dotting of every "i." As it comes through the House, I suspect that its virtue might be somewhat tarnished, and I suspect that it might be changed as the representatives of the American people have a chance to work on it. Then, when it gets here, it has to go first before the appropriate committees, and those include the Foreign Relations Committee, the Appropriations Committee—if appropriations are involved—and still has to come to the floor.

So, with all due respect to the Senators who have raised this point—I do not question their concern in raising it—it appears to the Senator from Vermont to be a bit of a red herring; because, first, the implementing legislation is not considered unless we ratify and, second, it goes before both Houses and it is treated by different standards.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the Senator from Vermont is repeating himself now.

What we are talking about here is what the Senator from Virginia described as "buying a pig in a poke."

We received testimony before the Armed Services Committee that the implementing legislation is very important, and there could be in it some provisions that might resolve some of the differences of opinion that exist over the economics involved in the canal, over the method of payments and the timing of those payments and the obligation of those payments. So the provisions that could be in it could be very vital for one's consideration of the treaties, favorably or unfavorably. We do not know what it is. So how can we fairly apprise ourselves and then appraise the value of the treaties? I do not think we can, because we do not know what is in it. We have been given the idea and we have been given the impression that what would be in it could be very vital and very important to the treaties themselves.

Mr. LEAHY. Does the Senator from Oklahoma feel that he would be constrained to vote one way or the other on the implementing legislation if it were brought up subsequent to ratification of the treaty? Or, to put it another way, does the Senator from Oklahoma feel that however we vote on the question of ratification forestalls his rights as a U.S. Senator to aid in the molding of that implementing legislation?

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me respond by saying that I do think very strongly that the implementing language could be agreed to, reluctantly, by those who supported the treaty, because they had supported the treaty and the administration wanted to implement the treaty in a certain way.

To answer the Senator's question directly, I do not think it would affect my position unless it led to a change in the treaty. If the treaties were changed, my position could change.

I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I pose a question as an analogy. Would the Senator from Oklahoma buy a house, sign a commitment to purchase it, without knowing what it would cost him?

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir.

Mr. HELMS. I do not think any other Senator in his right mind would do that.

Maybe the difference is, I say to the Senator from Oklahoma, that Congress spends other people's money, not our own money. It is mighty easy to spend the taxpayers' money, as has been demonstrated day after day, year after year, in the Congress of the United States. That is the difference.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one quick, corollary question?

Mr. HELMS. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the Members of the Senate should be much more careful about how the money is spent, whether or not the implementing legislation does involve the spending of money, which the Senator from Vermont implies, since he seems to think that the legislation will originate in the House, which would be required if it were an appropriation.

Mr. LEAHY. May I follow up one question with the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HELMS. Certainly.

Mr. LEAHY. Would the Senator buy a house he might have wanted to buy if he were told, "We won't tell you what the price is now, but we'll let you, having determined to buy it, say what the price will be"? I might be willing to take a deal such as that, being in the market for a new house myself. But I probably should not say it, the way realtors move around this area. If I could buy a house to my design and I could decide subsequently what, if anything, I want to pay for it, I would not think that was a bad deal.

Mr. HELMS. That is not the question.

Mr. LEAHY. It really is, if we are going to follow the analogy of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina; because, if any money is involved in this—and I do not know whether there is—the Senate and the House have a right to put the money in or not to put a cent in.

Mr. HELMS. If the Senator believes that, he will believe anything.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Virginia for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes again the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, for a question I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. President, of course each Member of the Senate must decide for himself whether he feels it is important to have available all of the information before voting on the treaties. I happen to feel it is important. Others may feel differently, and I have no quarrel with that.

When Elmer Staats, Comptroller General of the United States, came before the Armed Services Committee and was queried on this matter, he told the Armed Services Committee that if he were a Senator he would want to have available the implementing legislation before voting on the treaties. Maybe many Senators do not need that and do not want that. But that is Mr. Staats' view.

Maj Gen. H. R. Parfitt, the Governor of the Canal Zone, told the Armed Services Committee that in his judgment knowledge of the implementing legislation would be very helpful to the Senate.

Let me quote from Mr. Staats, the Comptroller General of the United States. He says this:

That the treaty implementing legislation is the key determinant of the financial viability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission.

I suspect that is the reason that the State Department has not been willing to submit to Congress the implementing legislation. I want to read again what the Comptroller General of the United States says:

That the treaty implementing legislation is the key determinant of the financial viability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission.

That is a very significant statement.

Let me read one other thing. May I invite the attention of the Senate to page S2013 of yesterday's Congressional Record on the desk of every Senator and at the bottom of that page the Senator from Massachusetts is speaking, Senator Brooke, and he says:

I also refer to the Foreign Relations Committee report, supplemental and minority views, where the head of the Congressional Budget Office informed the Committee: "Clearly, because the implementing legislation has not been submitted, the complete estimate of the budget impact of the treaties is impracticable at this time."

The head of the Congressional Budget Office has informed the Foreign Relations Committee and through it the Senate and through it Congress that without this implementing legislation the budget impact of the treaties is impracticable to judge at this time.

So how can we judge what it is going to cost the taxpayers until we have all the facts before us and the legislation which will implement the new treaties, assuming that they are ratified.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. Bartlett) for yielding.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia for adding this very informative information, and I would add just a small footnote to it by saying that by the very virtue of the State Department saying, originally, that they would have the implementing legislation ready in October of last year, they were assuring Congress that it would be ready prior to the consideration of the treaties, they considered it important, apparently, to the consideration of the treaties because of having it available at that early date. Apparently, it is because they cannot agree upon what should be included in the implementing legislation that it is not now ready. Because of that difference of opinion, I think it is all the more important that this body know what the final version will be. So I think it is important that we do receive that legislation prior to the final vote on ratification of the treaties.

I understand that the Senator from Alaska would like me to yield.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one observation?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, for an observation.

Mr. LAXALT. To bring home again the point of the need for the implementing legislation, I can remember just 3 weeks ago, or certainly no longer than a month ago, when the version of these treaties was around this town to the effect that it was not going to cost a nickel of taxpayers' money. The Senator from Oklahoma remembers that; does he not?

Mr. BARTLETT. I remember hearing that very definitely.

Mr. LAXALT. And yet it is clear now by reason of the work that was done by the Armed Services Committee that rather than not having it cost a nickel it could cost in excess of $2 billion.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct.

Mr. LAXALT. And that to me is proof positive of the fact that the administration simply has not been telling us all the facts.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct, and it will cost $2 billion to give away, virtually overnight, an asset worth almost $10 billion.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not know that we have seen the whole picture yet. If we are able to see implementing legislation up here and have it processed by the money committees, then we would have an even more accurate handle about what these treaties are going to cost. It may well be it is in excess of $2 or $3 billion, and I personally think for us to think in terms of incurring this kind of financial obligation without on the same track considering the implementing legislation is bad procedure.

I agree totally with what the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Oklahoma have been saying in this regard.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator very much.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, without losing my right to the floor, I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to state to the Senator from Oklahoma and others who have participated in this debate so far that there are some aspects of this treaty that I think really cannot be weighed without first knowing the terms of this legislation.

Take, for instance, the meeting that Senators Eagleton, Wallop, and I held in Panama with the civil servants now working for the Panama Canal Company. This treaty presumes that these civil servants will stay in Panama and train their replacements. The statement that has been made is that we will receive legislation which will offer them incentives to do so.

So far, I have seen no inclination from the administration to squarely face the question as to what inducements are necessary to encourage an American citizen, say, of mid-career level to undertake to train a Panamanian to replace him or her without knowing whether he is going to be able to relocate to somewhere in the United States, whether he is going to be retrained for a different job, under what conditions he is going to be allowed to continue to live where he is, or whether he is going to pay additional costs to the Panamanian Government in order to live in the places that he or she is living in now. The whole relationship of these employees to the Panama Canal during this transitional period proposed by the treaties is dependent upon the terms and conditions of the plan which will give them the proper incentives to do so.

Having served on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and now on the subcommittee of the Governmental Affairs Committee that has jurisdiction over this subject, I was sought out by representative of some of the government employee unions in Panama. They were very frank with me and the other Senators present that they are very unhappy over the situation and that we should be on notice that many employees will not stay in Panama. They informed us that they will have a choice to make soon and the choice is either to go somewhere else now and seek outside employment while they are still young enough to do so, or to stay on for 5, 10, or 15 years and continue to serve their Government. They are willing to aid their Government, but they need to see under what conditions they can stay.

I had to tell them that we did not know the terms of that legislation. And to my knowledge the administration has not yet informed Congress of what is to be their proposal to those who are employed in the canal now and those who might be needed to replace some that would leave just by attrition of their own decisions. What is the Government going to offer those Americans we are asking to stay in Panama to carry out the policies of our country throughout this transitional period?

The Senator from Vermont says we could vote against the proposal. It is not a question of voting against the subsequent legislation, rather it involves the question of whether we ought to be voting on these treaties now, before we even know what the terms are. How can this arrangement work? While in Panama I talked to people, including tugboat operators, some of whom incidentally had worked in Alaskan waters, and I knew their families. I talked to people working along the locks. I talked to people working in almost every capacity. Senator Eagleton and I heard representatives of almost every union operating in the Panama Canal Zone, and they told us their people have to know if this is going to work, and what the terms and conditions for continued employment of American citizens in the Panama Canal will be during this transitional period. This treaty makes no mention of these important matters.

The legislation involving these issues was supposed to be forthcoming last fall. We have not even seen it yet, but still we are being asked to vote on it. I think those of us who have a primary responsibility to the Senate in the area of civil service laws and the review of the rights, privileges, and obligations of such employees ought to know. Yet the Senator is asking why some of us would question voting for these treaties without first seeing this legislation.

It is not all implementing legislation in the sense of carrying out the authorization to pay money. There is legislation that must be enforced if we are to believe the administration is willing to keep its commitment to make the treaties work. We cannot be hassling 2, 3, or 4 years from now over the terms of this legislation. This is not a partisan comment, because, as the Senator from Oklahoma knows, I have been trying to get fairness for the people who work for the BIA for about 6 years now.

These were employees affected by the Supreme Court decision which, in midcareer, terminated their promotion possibilities. President Ford vetoed that legislation, and we do not know what President Carter will do with it, but it involves the very same considerations. Every administration to date, whether Republican or Democratic, has refused to deal with the problem of giving people career incentives or retraining opportunities, or some other sort of lateral transfer rights and guarantees. They have refused to wrestle with the problem of what to do with people whose midcareer promotion opportunities have been terminated by legislative action. I think this is just as important an issue as that raised in connection with the BIA.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the distinguished Senator from Alaska. I think he is giving attention to one area where this country has an obligation: those faithful employees of the Canal Company who want to know what their future is, and who want to know about the machinery to develop the boards and commissions that would be utilized in the transition period. We do not know what that is. We do not know that what is proposed would work. We do not know whether we can reach agreement. We think we could, on implementing legislation, if we had a chance, but nonetheless this should come ahead of consideration of the treaties themselves, because the implementing legislation will be a very important consideration with respect to the treaties.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Is it not correct that whatever legislation is needed to implement the treaties, if we advise and consent to the treaties. Aren't the treaties molded and shaped by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. BARTLETT. I say this to the Senator from Maryland: It is very obvious that there is, according to testimony from the State Department, sharp disagreement there on what should be in the implementing legislation; yet they are aware, and have been for a long time, of the provisions in the treaties.

So there apparently are differences of approach, differences of degree.

Mr. SARBANES. But it is the Congress that will shape the legislation and decide on it. We, in effect, will determine that. It seems to me we have the treaty provisions before us, and one has to judge them on their face and in terms of their implications. I disagree very strongly with the assertion that has been made on the floor of the Senate—that one cannot, by analyzing the treaty provisions, arrive at some judgment of what the economic consequences of these treaties are.

I think it is very clear that one can do that. We can get into disagreements here on the floor of the Senate as to the consequences, depending on certain assumptions about the impact on traffic patterns of economic developments, and how certain provisions will work out; but the treaty provisions, upon analysis, will reveal what the economic consequences are, and Members will be in a position to make that judgment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would say to the Senator from Maryland that he certainly is entitled to his opinion, but the Comptroller General of the United States, Mr. Staats, did testify before our committee that in his opinion it would be impossible to know what the full economic impact of the treaties would be without knowing what was in the implementing legislation.

Mr. SARBANES. Of course, Senator Culver, who is also a member of your committee, directed specific inquiries to the Secretary of State has a consequence of some of the questions raised. He received responses that indicated, with respect to certain issues that had been raised and upon which there was disagreement within the committee, the approach which the administration was planning to take.

Now, that approach is not one that the Congress need necessarily adopt when the matter is before us; and the approach we take when the matter is before us will determine what the economic consequences are.

So, in analyzing the treaties, you are in a position to base your argument on one assumption or the other, but the treaty provision and its economic consequences are before us, and we are in a position to make that judgment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think it is fairly clear that the State Department itself felt it was important that we have the implementing legislation prior to the consideration of the treaties, because they advised the Senate that we would have it in October. There have been delays since that period. Why there has been no explanation as to the reason the State Department cannot resolve its difficulties, or why they cannot come up with a precise single version of the implementing legislation, I do not know. But it would appear to me that either the differences are very sharp and the consequences are very important, or the State Department is just delaying for the purpose that we will not have that information prior to the consideration of the treaties.

Mr. SARBANES. But the proposals made by the Department are not written in concrete. We will shape them. They may make some sort of proposal to implement these treaties which I may disagree with and want to have shaped differently. It is not written in concrete. We will shape that legislation, and we are in a position, therefore, to change it at the time according to what we think are the appropriate considerations. In judging the treaties which have now been negotiated between two sovereign powers, we have simply to make the calculation in terms of what the consequences are going to be.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think, as the Senator from Virginia said, and perhaps the Senator from Minnesota, we are put in the position of "buying a pig in a poke."

Mr. SARBANES. I do not agree with that. That is the point I want to make. We are in a position of analyzing the treaty terms, and analyzing them in terms of what their consequences will be. You can make a worst case assumption, a best case assumption, or something in between, depending on what constitutes reasonable assumptions to make. Any legislation to implement the treaties will have to carry out, and would be consistent with, the terms of the treaties; and therefore that analysis puts us in a position to make the judgment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me ask the Senator from Maryland a question. If you had a choice, would you like to see the implementing legislation now or after we have considered and ratified the treaties?

Mr. SARBANES. I think that the question is not an essential one, because what I have to judge are the terms of the treaties, and we will have the opportunity to shape the implementing legislation.

Mr. BARTLETT. You are not answering the question.

Mr. SARBANES. And the State Department's version of the implementing legislation does not bind me in any way.

Mr. BARTLETT. This may not be the best question in the world, but would the Senator desire to answer it?

Mr. SARBANES. As I have indicated, I do not think it is essential to my consideration of the treaties. What I have to do is take the terms of the treaties and analyze them.

Mr. BARTLETT. But would you not like to see the implementing legislation? I think the Senator would.

Mr. SARBANES. As I have indicated, I do not think the implementing legislation is going to affect the treaty terms. The implementing legislation will have to be consistent with the treaty terms. What we have to do is analyze those terms, and know what the consequences of those terms are going to be. In that sense, the question of the economic consequences is a legitimate matter which we will have to discuss on the floor of the Senate; but the economic consequences of the treaties are contained in the terms of the treaties.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, there could very well be some obligations made by the State Department, as the Senator knows, obligating this Nation to certain provisions which could be in the implementing legislation. I am not saying that that is the case; I do not know, because I do not know what is in the implementing legislation. But I do know that in the long negotiations, there were plenty of opportunities for this Nation to commit itself one way or another to a number of different things. For us to know the final economic obligations that have been made, I think we need to see the implementing legislation.

I grant that this body and the House would consider these items in the proper legal way. But, nevertheless, what is presented by the administration which was responsible for the negotiations of the treaties themselves to us will have some impact. I do not think we can just disregard that information and say that it is not important that we see it in advance. I feel certain the Senator from Maryland would like to see it. I know that the State Department made every effort, or indicated that they made every effort, to have this available to us in October. But they have not done it. Certainly, they have had ample time since October to work on this and to present it.

Mr. SARBANES. The obligations to be assumed, as I said, are contained in the treaty and require the analysis. The State Department cannot undertake an obligation for the Nation unless it is done pursuant to our constitutional process. That involves in the first instance, treaties, and, subsequently, if necessary, legislation. Both the treaties and the legislation are subject to congressional action, in the first instance on the part of the Senate, with a majority of two-thirds required to approve the treaty, and, of course, with respect to legislation, by enactment by the Congress of the United States. We are in a position, of course, to make those findings and determinations, which we are trying to do now with respect to the terms of the treaty.

[Mr. Kennedy assumed the chair.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, recently we began one of the most historic debates in the annals of the U.S. Senate. In the long and arduous days ahead, 100 individuals, representing the 50 very different States of our Nation, will decide the future of the Panama Canal—one of the great man-made wonders of the world—an American-made engineering feat of great benefit to all mankind. Although Great Britain had expressed an interest in building a canal in the Isthmus of Panama, and France, under Count Ferdinand de Lesseps of Suez fame, actually attempted to build a canal in Panama, it was the United States which possessed the diverse technologies necessary to build the canal and it was the United States which did the job. Using powerful steam shovels the Americans literally moved mountains, and using modern medical science, Americans conquered malaria, yellow fever, and cholera, in order to complete the magnificent set of locks which now permit gigantic ships to save 15,748 miles in traveling between Los Angeles and New York. Today, that is about 40 days, much energy and many dollars.

The future of all of that achievement, with all of its value, will be decided by the 100 individuals in this Chamber. With so much at stake, we should not be surprised that Americans are watching each day's events very closely in order to insure that the issues which must be faced are dealt with in a straightforward manner. It was in this spirit that the Senate Armed Services Committee held its hearings on the proposed Panama Canal Treaty and the proposed Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

Under rule XXV(C) of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Armed Services Committee is referred all legislation, messages, petitions, and the like related to our country's Armed Forces and national security, and "maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal, including the administration, sanitation, and government of the Canal Zone". Our committee has never taken this canal oversight responsibility lightly in the past, and it has continued this fine tradition in its recent hearings on the proposed transfer of control of the Canal Zone to the Government of Panama. We called only the most professional of witnesses, both advocates and opponents of the proposed treaties.

The list of witnesses testifying on the military and economic aspects of the proposed treaties speaks for itself:

Hansell, Legal Adviser, Department of State; Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Jr., USA, Chairman, Inter-American Defense Board; Maj. Gen. George L. Mabry, USA (retired), former commander of the U.S. Army Forces, Southern Command; H. R. Parfitt, Governor of the Panama Canal Zone and President of the Panama Canal Company; Elmer B. Staats, Comptroller General of the United States; Frank A. Nicholai, executive vice president, American Management Systems, Inc.

These military leaders and economists produced an impressive hearing record whose message is quite clear.

Both advocates of the proposed treaties and their opponents agreed that the Panama Canal is a chokepoint crucial to the economic and military interests of the United States and the rest of the Western Hemisphere. In the words of Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, the very distinguished former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

A maritime link between the Atlantic and the Pacific is vital to the security of the United States and will always be so.

The military significance of the canal is quite clear. For 5,300 combat ships and approximately 8,500 military transport ships used the Panama Canal in World War II. During the 3 years of the Korean War, military use of the canal grew 2½ times. During the Cuban missile crisis, a task force of 22 American Navy vessels transited from the Pacific to the Atlantic through the canal on the 2 days of November 5 and 6, 1962, in order to take part in the quarantine of Cuba. The task force returned to the Pacific in December. During the 6 months surrounding that crisis, use of the canal doubled. From 1964, when regular formations of U.S. ground troops entered Vietnam, to the height of the war in 1968, annual transits of U.S. warships grew from 86 to 147. During the same period transits by U.S. Government vessels increased from 285 to 1,504 a year. During fiscal year 1968, 69 percent of U.S. Government cargo destined for Vietnam went through the Panama Canal. This last year, about an average peacetime year, U.S. Navy transits through the canal were about 20, that is, about what they were before the Cuban missile crisis.

Gen. Louis H. Wilson the present Commandant of the Marine Corps, added another reason for the military importance of the Panama Canal. Speaking as a marine he noted the "very real requirement to move the Navy's amphibious ships from ocean to ocean in the shortest possible time." Testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, confirmed by my recent visit to the Pacific, indicates that the Navy and Marine Corps suffer from a shortage in amphibious lift capability. That shortage in amphibious capability would be made far worse if the United States were deprived of unencumbered use of the Panama Canal. A recent study by the Library of Congress indicates that without the Panama Canal, it would take 60 days, rather than 45 days, to assemble a full-scale Marine amphibious force which might be required in Europe.

The Panama Canal Zone is of great military value for reasons other than the use of the canal. American military bases in Panama provide an advanced base for operations in the Western Hemisphere, in the Caribbean, and in the South Pacific. American facilities in the Canal Zone also provide an American military presence in Latin America of great political significance and provide training grounds for our forces and those of our hemispheric allies.

The extensive American base system in Panama includes the naval facilities at Cristobal on the Atlantic and Balboa on the Pacific, the Air Force facilities at Howard Air Force Base and Albrook Air Force Station, and numerous Army installations, including the Jungle Warfare Center and the School of the Americas.

The economic importance of inexpensive and unrestricted use of the Panama Canal to the United States and its Latin American trading partners is also very great. The United States has opened the canal to all nations and has operated it without profit. Actual loss of the use of the Panama Canal would result in major expenses to people everywhere because of the need to purchase additional shipping tonnage and the increased fuel costs.

The Maritime Administration of the U.S. Department of Commerce estimated in 1974 that closure of the canal would add $964 million each year to the cost of our trade between the east coast of the United States and Asia. Trade between the west coast of the United States and Europe would cost $100 million more each year, with comparable costs involved in trade between North and South America and with U.S. intercoastal trade. Changes in the structure of international trade make it difficult to predict the future economic value of the Panama Canal. Who would have predicted the massive economic rise of Japan and its importance to the east coast of the United States? And who would have predicted the importance of oil from the North Slope of Alaska to the east coast of the United States? Again, none of the witnesses before our committee, whether for or against the proposed treaties, dismissed the military and economic importance of the Panama Canal.

Nevertheless, military witnesses including Lt. Gen. Dennis McAuliffe, the Commander of the U.S. Southern Command, agree that the security of this strategic canal is being transferred to one of the smallest and weakest nations in Latin America, a nation with a history of unstable governments. Panama has a population of 1.7 million people, which aside from the Caribbean Island states, makes it the third smallest nation in Latin America. General McAuliffe testified that the "Guardia Nacional" has 8,000 men, 75 percent of whom handle police functions.

The remaining 25 percent consists of 1,500 light infantry troops, several rifle companies, and 6 platoons equipped with 16 armored cars. Panama has no artillery, no tanks, no missiles, and no combat aircraft other than helicopters. The Panamanian Navy consists of two 103-foot patrol craft with 20mm guns and a medium landing ship. The Central Intelligence Agency estimates that, under a total mobilization, Panama could provide a maximum of 270,000 males between the ages of 17 and 49 fit for military service.

The authoritative publication of the International Institute of Strategic Studies, entitled "The Military Balance," which details the military force structure of the nations of the world, dismisses Panama in a footnote, citing simply the existence of a paramilitary force—the Panamanian National Guard. By way of contrast, Cuba has 189,000 regular forces along with 13,000 paramilitary forces and a "People's Militia" of 100,000 people. Cuba's Air Force alone (20,000) is twice the size of Panama's entire military force. Colombia, which formerly owned the Isthmus of Panama, has regular forces totaling 56,500, with a combined navy and air force larger than the total forces of Panama. Panama's inability to defend itself and the canal militarily is made worse by its own political and economic instability. In its first 70 years, Panama had 59 governments, and the present military dictatorship itself came to power through a military coup.

Economically, Panama is also in trouble. According to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "Panama's total disbursed external debt was $1.1 billion," an amount approximately half of Panama's annual gross national product.

Panama's historic instability should be of great concern to all who believe that control of the vital Canal Zone should be turned over to the Government of Panama. Testimony before the Armed Services Committee indicates that the Government of Panama itself poses the most real threat to continued unencumbered use of the canal, either through its own actions or by its acquiescence in the actions of others. For example, in open testimony General McAuliffe revealed that it was the National Guard of Panama which was involved in the 1976 bombings in the Canal Zone and that it was the inaction of that same National Guard which permitted anti-American riots to continue for several days in 1964. It is powerful and politically active elements of this same National Guard which maintains close ties with Castro's secret police. Yet, this is the force which would be called upon, under the proposed treaties, to protect American citizens and property using the canal. Worse, through separate agreements outside the treaties, the United States must provide arms and military assistance to this paramilitary group, sections of which pose the most immediate threat to American interests in Panama.

Therefore, it is not surprising that the Armed Services Committee hearings also underline the degree to which Panama's not-so-veiled threat to initiate or condone violence against the canal, if Panama is not granted control of that waterway, constitutes the fundamental argument for the new treaties. It was this political justification which was cited by Admiral Holloway and General Taylor to explain their support for the proposed treaties despite their dissatisfaction with many of the military provisions in those treaties.

Given these concerns over the security of the canal, it is not surprising that Latin American leaders have expressed their lack of confidence in the ability of Panama to secure the canal and manage it effectively. Heads of state and cabinet ministers throughout Latin America have informed many visiting Americans, including Members of the Senate, that their own economic and security interests may be threatened by General Torrijos and his abuse or mismanagement of the canal. Many, maybe even most, have expressed their wishes that the United States retain control of the canal and continue to operate it efficiently and fairly. In fact, according to Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Jr., Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board, many military leaders in Central and South America would prefer an international approach to operating and securing the canal.

Each of the defense experts appearing before our committee, including such proponents of the new treaties as Admiral Holloway, the present Chief of Naval Operations, and General Wilson, the present Commandant of the Marine Corps, agreed that an American military presence in Panama until 1999, and after 1999, is highly desirable, even though such an American military presence would be prohibited after 1999 by the proposed Treaty of Neutrality. Given the military and economic value of the canal to the United States, the almost universal agreement of military leaders throughout the United States on this issue is understandable.

Advocates of the proposed treaties were greatly disappointed that testimony before the Armed Services Committee did not provide evidence that made clear the right of the United States to reintroduce military forces into Panama to maintain the neutrality of the canal. On the contrary, testimony indicated that language in the Treaty of Neutrality which is alleged to give the United States that right is extremely ambiguous and would be even more so in those times of crisis and confusion when the United States might actually need to intervene in the area around the Panama Canal. While proponents continue to argue that this vague language in article IV of the Treaty of Neutrality gives the United States the right to intervene in Panama when our Government believes the neutrality of the canal is threatened, Panamanian Government officials consistently maintain that the right of the United States to defend the canal does not include defending its neutrality against Panama and goes into effect only when the Government of Panama requests American intervention.

Even after signing the October 13 joint statement with President Carter, which is claimed by some to clarify the U.S. right to intervene, Torrijos has maintained that the role of the United States is to protect the canal against foreign aggression, not against Panamanian violations of the neutrality of the canal. In the words of General Torrijos, Panamanians "push the button, the bell rings, and the United States is obliged to come to our defense." This interpretation of the joint statement finds support from the American Law Division of the Library of Congress which has concluded:

It is not altogether clear that the statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action.

Language which permits such diverse interpretations obviously grants the United States no greater right than that of raw force to intervene in Panama. William P. Clements, former Deputy Secretary of Defense and also a former supporter of the treaties, testified that he was shocked by changes in this language from what he had originally approved before leaving the Defense Department in early 1977. According to Clements, the original language read:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the Canal, the Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for the Canal's neutrality and security through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each party shall take such other diplomatic, economic or military measures as it deems necessary in accordance with its constitutional processes.

This language, which Secretary Clements approved, gives the United States the right to determine when the neutrality of the canal has been violated. The changes that were made deprive the United States of an absolutely clear right to intervene to protect the neutrality of the canal. Obviously, the new, ambiguous language protects the Government of Panama from legal American intervention if Panama should itself threaten international use of the canal.

In addressing the issue of the right of the United States to defend the canal under the new treaties, General Wilson said:

Presumably we have the right to go in and it is in the treaty, I have been assured, and if it is not in the treaty then it ought to get into the treaty. That is the only reason I will be for it.

Since the right to defend the canal was stated clearly in the language above quoted by Secretary Clements, any language less emphatically clear than that language cannot be acceptable.

Perhaps the most earth-shaking testimony received by the Armed Services Committee involved the value of the Canal Zone property and the cost of its transfer to the Government of Panama. According to the Panama Canal Company, the original cost value of the Panama Canal enterprise was over $993 million, as follows:

A. Original cost value of the Panama Canal enterprise (April 1977)

	Million
Lands, titles and treaty rights	$14.7
Interest during original construction	50.9
Canal excavation, fills and embankments, dry dock excavation.....	324.9
Canal structures and equipment	203.5
Other marine facilities	29.6
Supporting and general facilities	176.7
Plant additions in progress.....	25.1
Schools, hospitals, and other facilities.....	111.9
Other.....	55.8
Total	993.1

*Includes $10 million paid to Panama under the 1903 treaty.

Some accountants, prefer to look at the book value of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone, which has been estimated at over $560 million, as shown by this table:

B. Book Value of the Panama Canal enterprise (plant and equipment, June 30, 1975)

	Million
Panama Canal Company.....	$501.8
Canal Zone Government	59.6
Total	561.4

The Department of Defense has indicated that the approximate acquisition and improvement costs as of fiscal year 1978 for military facilities to be turned over to Panama are nearly $353 million, as follows:

C. Acquisition and improvement costs of military facilities to be turned over to Panama (fiscal year 1978)

	Million
Treaty starting day	$27.5
Other facilities to be turned over sometime during the treaty term	33.5
On termination of the treaty	291.9
Total cost of military facilities	352.9

SOURCE. Department of Defense.

However, I believe that a more real estimate of value in today's terms is the replacement cost of the Panama Canal, the Canal Zone, and the military facilities there, which exceeds $9.8 billion, as follows:

D. Replacement value of canal operations (including Armed Forces)

	Billion
Property, plant, and equipment	$3.573
The Panama Canal	5.000
Military, naval, and air plant	1.245
Total	9.818

But the value of the property transferred to Panama, or whose use is lost to the United States, is not the only expense involved. The very act of transferring American property in the Canal Zone to the Government of Panama entails direct costs to the United States, certainly over $750 million, but possibly far higher because the Panama Canal Treaty requires that the United States turn the canal over to Panama free of liens and debts. For example, differences of opinion appear to exist in Panama and Washington as to whether the $10 million a year contingency payment promised to Panama out of revenue surplus, which is cumulative, constitutes a debt of the Panama Canal Commission in 1999. At that time, other debts of the Commission may also exist.

The following itemizes some of these direct costs to the United States:

E. Possible direct cost to United States

	Million
Military relocation	$43
Civil service early retirement, approximate	150
DOD schools/hospitals	110
Foregone interest payment	440
Foregone payment for past services to Panama	9
Inventory of assets	2
Total	784

The State Department has also indicated that Panama will receive $345 million in economic and military assistance outside the treaties.

In addition, during the life of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty, Panama expects to receive over $1½ billion which will be paid out of toll increases. The following itemizes these costs:

F. Payments to Panama out of toll increases:

	Million
0.30 canal-ton—$40 million per year, probably more.....	$880
$10 million per year—annuity.....	220
$10 million per year for services, renegotiable.....	220
$10 million out of surplus.....	220
Total	1,540

These toll increases will mean higher prices for both producers and consumers throughout the world. Since well over half the trade going through the Panama Canal either originates or terminates in American ports, the people of the United States will pay a major part of the cost of this toll increase. In summary, the replacement cost of the Panama Canal Zone and facilities there is nearly $10 billion, and it is going to cost the world, mainly the United States, well over $2 billion to give that property away. Having given it away, under the threat of violence, there is still no guarantee that we have the right to protect the canal after 1999, and we have no guarantee that the Government of Panama can afford, financially, to keep it open in the future.

Elmer Staats, the Comptroller General of the United States, testified that the economic viability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission was in doubt. Governor Parfitt, of the Canal Zone, added his own warning when he said, "I believe you should be alert to the possibility that the canal operation may not be self-sustaining in the out years." Governor Parfitt, Mr. Staats, and Mr. Frank A. Nicolai, an economic consultant to the committee, agreed that the financial success of the Canal Commission under the treaties depends greatly upon implementing legislation which has not been presented to the Congress, although implementing legislation was promised to the Senate in October of last year.

While the State Department Legal Adviser, Mr. Herbert Hansell, insisted that this delay was not a stratagem designed by the administration to deprive the Senate of information detrimental to approval of the treaties, he admitted that the delay results from difficulty in drafting controversial provisions including those dealing with labor relations. Thus, no one testified that Panama, which has a very weak economy and whose government is in grave debt, could afford to maintain the canal without outside help during times of economic difficulty. Further, the governor of the Canal Zone and the Comptroller General of the United States testified that because of heavy payments to Panama of $60 to $70 million per year, the canal might be a money losing proposition under the terms of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty, even during that period when the United States retained control. And what if, after 1999, the canal turns out to be an economic white elephant?

Although the new treaties are proposed as a means to improve relations with Panama, the enormous impact of divergent interpretations of the economic provisions of the treaty could lead to irreconcilable tensions and disputes. Governor Parfitt and Mr. Staats both suggested that ambiguous provisions of the treaties be clarified with Panama as soon as possible so that there will be no misunderstandings. Comptroller General Staats singled out, in particular, the provisions of the new Canal Treaty providing for a $10 million contingency payment to Panama out of any surplus achieved each year by the new Canal Commission. If no surplus is achieved in any one year, the obligation is carried over until the next year. Staats expressed concern that lack of agreement on how this surplus was to be determined and how any accrued debt would be handled after 1999 could irreparably injure United States-Panamanian relations.

Because payments to Panama by the Canal Commission out of tolls alone during the next 22 years will equal approximately 70 percent of Panama's current annual GNP, significant issues are involved as the following exchange with Governor Parfitt illustrates:

Senator BARTLETT. I believe you told Senator McIntyre that the Canal Commission would expect to set its toll revenue to meet its cost and that if this contingent payment was not included in the plan for setting tolls, there would be little surplus to pay the Panamanians since the Commission is not a profitmaking organization.

Governor PARFITT. That is correct, sir.

Senator BARTLETT. So what we would have here is a situation in which we have promised to pay the Panamanians out of any surplus which the Commission earns but the Commission is not expected to have any surplus.

Governor PARFITT. Under a situation which we now forecast, which is one of ever-increasing demand for additional tolls, we would not be generating surpluses, at least in very significant amounts.

Senator BARTLETT. And if we include the contingency payment in the estimate of operating costs, we increase the chance of the Canal Commission running into debt, and we have said to the Panamanians that we will turn the canal over to them free of debt.

Governor PARFITT. That is correct, sir.

Senator BARTLETT. Given the large sums of money involved and the ambiguities in the treaty, which could cost either the United States or Panama large sums of money, depending upon how the disputes are resolved, could you, Governor Parfitt, tell me how the two nations are going to avoid disputes and conflicts over the interpretation? In other words, the same question I asked Mr. Staats.

Governor PARFITT. Obviously there are built in some difficulties and we hope that these can be ironed out through the various committees that have been established in effect to try to resolve these problems. Certainly the problem related to the contingency payment seems to be one that cannot be resolved in that fashion in view of the conflicting views of both parties right now.

Senator BARTLETT. I would assume that the Congress would want to see that these differences are resolved, and how would you suggest the Congress do that?

Governor PARFITT. We had hoped most of them at least can be resolved through the implementing legislation that the Administration is now trying to develop.

Senator BARTLETT. But if the implementing legislation expresses a Congressional point of view or even an Administration point of view, and if that is not the point of view of the Panamanians, then there would still be the controversy.

Governor PARFITT. That is correct, if this does not represent really the agreement of Panama and the United States the implementing legislation will not resolve that conflict.

Senator BARTLETT. Unless the Panamanians reach some agreement with the United States executed by President Torrijos or someone from Panama?

Governor PARFITT. Or unless they in fact agree with the interpretation of the Administration as it is implemented in the legislation. There seems to be a little difference of opinion as to what the Panamanians agree to and do not agree to. I have not had that direct an association with them so I do not know directly what their position is.

Senator BARTLETT. That would require a signed instrument, would it not?

Governor PARFITT. It would appear to involve some kind of a signed instrument or some kind of a reservation or amendment to the basic documents.

Upon reflection, this particular testimony makes clear the need for amendments to the economic provisions of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty. These economic amendments are no less necessary than are the military amendments to the proposed Treaty of Neutrality which seem clearly required in light of the testimony of former Deputy Defense Secretary Clements cited above.

The entire testimony received by the Senate Armed Services Committee points toward one inescapable conclusion—failure to make major revisions in the proposed Panama Canal treaties could result in great loss to the United States and great tensions with Panama. And clearly, if these changes are to have any real meaning, the treaties must be returned to Panama for consideration by their government and then they must be ratified by a plebiscite of the people of Panama as required by their constitution.

Mr. President, a treaty is an agreement between two parties arrived at through negotiation. Most Americans are not familiar with treaties per se, but they are familiar with the procedures used to arrive at the final terms of the treaty, and the final ratification.

A treaty, in very simplified terms, is merely a contract, and therefore, it is generally agreed that procedures similar to contract negotiation are used in its final ratification. The American public does have a general and fundamental knowledge of this procedure which recognizes the rules by which a treaty is validly ratified by both parties.

It is likely that there will be amendments adopted to this treaty, and once we have adopted these amendments, we have changed the terms of the treaty. As in common contract law, the treaty then represents a new offer to the country of Panama, which then must be reratified. Further, the ratification must come in the same form as that used on the first treaty or offer.

An attempt to ratify the treaty in a different way would produce an invalid treaty with no binding effect. Although both countries could immediately support the treaties, either country could later claim the treaty or treaties to be invalid and hence not binding. Such a loophole could eventually work strongly in Panama's favor.

We are all consumers, and we all negotiate and enter into contracts. It is commonly understood that an illegally adopted contract can be broken and, therefore, an illegally ratified treaty is subject to being broken for the same reason.

Some may question the constitutional operation of the Panamanian Government, but the fact remains that article 274 of their constitution requires a plebiscite to ratify a treaty dealing with the Panama Canal. To make the treaty binding, it must be adopted in this manner.

If the U.S. Senate makes the amendments that are expected, or other amendments, a Panamanian plebiscite should result, and we should not accept a treaty that has been adopted in any other manner.

There are two questions that I would ask my colleagues. Do you believe that Panama would accept a treaty that had not been ratified by the U.S. Senate? Could you, as an elected representative, allow a treaty additionally amended by Panama to be accepted by the United States without additional consideration in the Senate, and a formal ratification as provided by our Constitution?

Many of the issues involved in this treaty may be glossed over, both by the executive branch and Members of the Senate, but this one question and procedure cannot. We cannot "whitewash" the issue of proper ratification. Nor, can we, as a world leader propounding a philosophy of equal treatment among nations and human rights, allow a treaty to be ratified without the proper participation by the people of Panama who are enfranchised under their own constitution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I wish at this time to restate some of my earlier concerns with regard to the two Panama Canal treaties and to speak briefly about some new concerns which have come to light. I have always maintained I would oppose any treaty under which the United States relinquishes absolute control of the Canal Zone and its defense positions. I have not altered my position. But at the same time, I am by no means suggesting a new treaty is not necessary. In light of several years of ongoing political turmoil and economic hardships, surely a better understanding should be reached on the operation of the canal and the Canal Zone. A reevaluation of the present situation and the existing treaties, in the interests of cooperation between the two countries, is certainly warranted.

However, I am very concerned about the treaties we are being asked to consider. As they stand, I am convinced they are not in the best interests of the United States, Panama, or Latin America. In my statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in October of last year, I enumerated some of my strongest concerns. At that time, I had cosponsored several amendments of Senator Dole, which addressed some of the major weaknesses of the treaties.

Article IV of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, I believe, is the weakest article of both treaties. There is nothing in article IV which assures that the United States can unilaterally intervene militarily in the defense of the canal.

Since July of 1977, the exact interpretation of the defense provisions of article IV have been widely debated and an agreement has still not been reached. The Joint Statement of Understanding which was made on October 14, 1977, for the very purpose of clearing up this misunderstanding, remains unsigned, and is itself misinterpreted still.

Amendment No. 20 which was introduced early this month, and which I cosponsored, is an attempt to clarify the defense provision. While the amendment, which embodies the language of the Carter-Torrijos Joint Statement of Understanding, would greatly improve the Neutrality Treaty, I believe it remains insufficient.

According to the American Law Division of the Library of Congress:

The Carter-Torrijos statement, while guaranteeing each party the right to act against threats directed at the Canal, also specifies that the United States may not intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. It is not altogether clear that the statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action.

Mr. President, I believe amendment No. 5 of Senator Dole, which I cosponsored in September, more adequately addresses the problem of defense of the Panama Canal. This amendment states:

Nothing in this Treaty may be construed to prevent the United States of America, in accordance with its Constitutional processes, from intervening militarily to maintain such regime of neutrality when determined to be seriously threatened by the President of the United States of America, or, through the adoption of a concurrent resolution, by the Congress of the United States of America.

This amendment clearly gives the United States the right to determine and act unilaterally to insure the neutrality of the canal. I believe it should be given serious consideration by the Senate.

I sincerely hope my colleagues will act positively on an amendment to assure that the United States can respond quickly and effectively in defense of the Panama Canal.

The exact definition of "expeditious passage" through the canal has also been open to varying degrees of interpretation over the past several months. Article VI of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal includes a provision which grants to the United States the right of "expeditious passage" through the canal in times of crisis. The Joint Statement in October was also intended to clarify this point, but has failed to do so.

Amendment number 21 which was introduced by both the distinguished majority and minority leaders, and which I again cosponsored, embodies the language of the joint understanding which was an attempt to explain the definition of expeditious passage. I support the effort as a step in the right direction, but I find the language is still open to misunderstanding. Panamanian negotiators and leaders continue to interpret the understanding differently than we are.

I cosponsored an amendment in September which Senator Dole had the foresight to introduce which addresses the problem of expeditious passage. Article VI of the Neutrality Treaty states that vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and the Republic of Panama will be entitled to transit the canal expeditiously. Amendment number 6 would add to that provision the words, "except that the Republic of Panama shall, upon request, afford privileged passage through the canal to such vessels of the United States of America during any period in which the United States of America is at war."

The rights of American ships to go to the head of the line in times of crisis must be clearly recognized and understood.

While the right of privileged passage and the question of U.S. defense of the canal are the two most important questions to resolve, I believe the treaties contain several other points which deserve consideration.

Article 12 of the Panama Canal Treaty contains a provision which would allow the United States to build a second canal, if we should ever wish to do so, only in the country of Panama. At the same time the treaty contains no firm commitment on the part of Panama to agree to permit us to construct that canal, should we decide to do so.

This provision is totally unacceptable. Why we would agree to build a second canal only in the country which has insisted on control of our first canal is totally incomprehensible. I cannot believe our negotiators accepted such a provision, knowing full well its restrictive implications. I have cosponsored an amendment which would have the effect of striking this provision from the treaty completely. I would hope serious consideration is given to this point in the days ahead.

Article 11 of the Panama Canal Treaty provides for the "orderly transition" of jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. The administration has been emphasizing a 22-year period in which this will occur. In fact, as soon as the treaty enters into force, the Republic of Panama will gain full jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. A complete transfer of U.S. judicial, administrative, and regulatory authority will be accomplished within 30 months.

In my opinion, this does not constitute an orderly transition. I believe there are very few American citizens who will remain in the Canal Zone, knowing they will be under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama. Large numbers may return to the United States leaving a void in the manpower support of the operations of the canal.

To that end, I would suggest serious consideration of an amendment which would allow the Panama Canal consultative committee to study the situation after the treaties take effect and make a recommendation as to when the period of transition should actually end. However, I would suggest January 1, 1990, should be the earliest time at which that would take place. Any treaty which subjects our U.S. citizens to Panamanian law and civil and criminal justice within 30 months after the treaty enters into force is totally impractical. Transfer of the administration of the Panama Canal Commission from United States to Panamanian leadership takes place on January 1, 1990, and it is only logical the two dates be coordinated.

Recently, additional testimony was given before the Senate Armed Services Committee which has only added to my initial concerns with regard to the wisdom of ratifying the new treaties without specific revisions.

I was particularly interested in testimony before that committee during the week of January 24 through February 1. Unfortunately, a great deal of this testimony was given very little attention in the press, initially, but the substance of the statements is well worth noticing.

Over the past several months we have heard a great deal from the Chiefs of Staff and other ranking officers, both active duty and retired, and I do value their opinions. There were differences of opinion as to the strengths and weaknesses of the pending treaties, and several constructive suggestions have been offered.

However, Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Jr. of the U.S. Army, and currently chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board, testified on January 31. I believe his testimony is especially revealing. The Inter-American Defense Board, as I am sure my colleagues know, consists of those 19 countries which are the signatories of the Rio Treaty. The organization was created in 1942 and it is the oldest multilateral military planning organization in the free world, including NATO. The Board is specifically charged with defense of the Western Hemisphere and the global strategic situation. As General Sumner pointed out, the Board does not normally become involved in bilateral issues because to do so would violate the very nature of the Board. The Board much prefers to, and does in fact, deal on the multilateral approach in solving the problems of the Western Hemisphere. As he noted, this is a hemisphere of peace, largely because all the countries have traditionally solved their individual problems on a multilateral basis. As the General noted, their record on this matter is very good and one of which they are rightly proud. It has been part of their heritage.

This brings me to an important point with which I do not think we have adequately dealt, and that is the concern of all of Latin America for the continued, efficient operation of the Panama Canal. Unfortunately, the Inter-American Defense Board has not been involved in any way in the canal negotiations. Those who would have us believe all of Latin America wholeheartedly approves of the new Panama Canal treaties and is anxious to see the United States turn over complete control to the Republic of Panama of so vital a waterway to each one of them, are misleading.

General Sumner pointed out that the Latin American countries consider the Panama Canal as the "Canal of the Americas" and it is vitally important to all the countries. The country of Ecuador alone passes 50 percent of all their exports through the canal. Contrary to those statements to the effect that our entire relationships with the Latin American countries depends on ratification of the treaties as they are written, almost all of the countries emphasized that their bilateral relations with the United States are too important to have them rise or fall on the Panama Canal treaties.

Rather than winning greater support and cooperation from the Latin American countries by relinquishing complete control of the canal to the Republic of Panama, I believe we will lose their support in the long run for failing to take into account and protect their best interests at this time.

Retired Maj. Gen. George L. Mabry, Jr., of the U.S. Army also testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee that day. General Mabry's testimony is, I believe, highly significant in light of his past service record. During his 35 years of active duty in the U.S. Army, he was stationed in the Canal Zone for a total of 10 years. His second tour of duty in the Canal Zone lasted from July 1962 through July of 1965. He served as Plans and Operations Officer of the Unified Command Headquarters located in the Canal Zone. He was charged with developing and maintaining up-to-date plans to protect and defend the canal. He was the first officer to arrive on the scene during the 1964 riots and directed the employment of U.S. troops. In this regard, I feel General Mabry is exceptionally qualified to speak to some of the, as yet, unanswered questions with regard to the Panama Canal treaties. General Mabry raised one very significant point which I wish to quote at this point. He said:

I do not understand and therefore am suspicious of why Panama insists that after the year 2000 no U.S. military forces can be stationed anywhere on Panamanian soil, even under a status of forces agreement. This is especially puzzling to me since we, the United States, have forces stationed in former enemy countries such as West Germany and Japan, and apparently are getting along very well. Why then, are the Panamanians, who claim they are going to be such great friends of the United States after the year 2000, so reluctant to accept the stationing of any U.S. military elements on Panamanian soil under a status of forces agreement? I cannot answer the question; maybe others can.

This is one Senator who cannot answer that question. I would hope someone can during the next few days of discussion.

Mr. President, in light of other recent testimony, given before the Senate Armed Services Committee, I am afraid we have been misled to some extent by the administration. When the Secretary of State testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he stated:

The treaties require no new appropriations, nor do they add to the burden of the American taxpayer.

This is clearly not the case.

A recent letter from the Secretary of State with regard to implementing legislation which we do not yet have, confirms that the canal would not be liable for interest payments to the U.S. Treasury. Those interest payments alone could cost our Government a minimum of $440 million by the year 2000.

There are other costs which will have to be covered through appropriated funds unless they are charged to the Canal Commission. It is estimated that the cost of relocating U.S. military bases may be close to $43 million. For those U.S. employees who opt for early retirement, costs could run as high as $165 million over the next 22 years.

Under the terms of the treaties, the United States has made various loan commitments to the Republic of Panama. These loan commitments include up to $200 million in Export-Import Bank credits, up to $75 million in Agency for International Development housing guarantees, $200 million in Overseas Private Investment Corporation loan guarantees, and $50 million in foreign military sale credits.

Under the terms of the treaties, total costs incurred over the next 22 years could be close to $2.3 billion. According to Major General Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone, these payments may have to be financed in large part, by higher tolls. The American taxpayer is certainly bound to feel the effects of the increased tolls, as about 70 percent of the canal traffic either originates or terminates in the United States.

Governor Parfitt further pointed out that under the treaties the United States is obligated to relinquish control of the canal to the Republic of Panama, free of any liens or debts, by the year 1999. If, during the next 22 years, the Canal Commission has not managed to operate in the black through the levying of increased tolls, the U.S. Government may be liable to pay off any deficit.

Mr. President, these are only a few of the many concerns I still have about these treaties. Not only have we failed to strengthen some of the most obvious weaknesses of the treaties which were initially noted, but each week over the past several months seems to have produced a new set of problems and unanswered questions. The ambiguities remain unresolved. We have already seen the friction which has developed between the two nations over the wording of only two issues. To leave so many key points still hanging in the wind and subject to individual interpretation in the future, only invites trouble. Each point of contention, however small, could escalate into a major dispute if not handled carefully and thoughtfully at this stage.

Mr. President, I am well aware of the arguments being made by those who wish to avoid a second plebescite. There is concern that should the U.S. Senate greatly amend the treaties, it would open up the possibility of further changes demanded by the Panamanians. I do not believe those are sound arguments in favor of acting quickly and perhaps carelessly on one of the most significant foreign policy matters with which we may ever be faced.

I strongly suggest, as my distinguished colleague Senator Dole has already noted, the Senate must advise on this matter before it grants consent through ratification of these treaties. Failing to do so, we would be remiss in our constitutional duties as Members of this body. We would fail in our responsibility to the President, and we would fail in our responsibility to the American people.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion?

Mr. HANSEN. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Matsunaga). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen).

AMENDMENT NO. 40

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 40 and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) proposes an amendment numbered 40: Strike article I, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

ARTICLE I

The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this Treaty. The same regime of neutrality shall apply to any other international waterway that may be built either partially or wholly in the territory of the Republic of Panama: Provided, That the military presence of the United States in what was the Panama Canal Zone on September 7, 1977, shall be continued beyond December 31, 1999, if the President of the United States deems it necessary for the defense of the Canal or the maintenance of the neutrality thereof and shall prior to December 31, 1999, so certify to the Government of Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have on occasion, here on this floor, discussed the need for this amendment, and have anticipated that there will be a vote on the amendment this week. I have been assured by the Senate majority leader that debate may proceed on the amendment for today and tomorrow, and that no effort will be made to table the amendment in that time.

As I have stated, I have felt that the logical procedure on consideration of these treaties was to consider first the Panama Canal Treaty, that is, the treaty that provides for transfer of the Panama Canal to Panama, and which states conditions under which it is to be transferred. By a vote of the Senate on yesterday, the Senate approved the procedure recommended by the joint leadership, that is, that we consider first, the Neutrality Treaty.

I thought it would be more logical, and apparently 29 or 39 other Senators felt the same, that we first ought to decide whether we were going to give the canal away before we determined the conditions under which in the year 2000 we will maintain the neutrality of the canal.

There is a larger issue involved here. That is that the leadership is supporting what the Government has referred to as the leadership amendment, which does amend, or which seeks to amend, articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty. It would seem to the Senator from Alabama that the strategy of the administration and of the leadership is going to be that on the approval of the leadership amendment, it will be pointed out that this is the only amendment which is necessary; that this protects the national interest, and, therefore, these other matters are matters of detail and we ought to very quickly come to a final resolution of the issue of these treaties.

The Senator from Alabama felt, and he felt so strongly that he did offer the motion on yesterday, cosponsored by some 15 Senators, that we ought to put the horse before the cart, so to speak, and we ought to consider first whether we are going to give the canal away before we worry about defending it in the year 2000.

The Senator from Alabama is one of the cosponsors of the leadership amendment. He, and all other Senators, I assume, was invited to cosponsor the leadership amendment.

I cosponsored because I felt that it offered some slight—and I say slight—improvement of the treaty.

I call the attention of Senators to the great similarity between article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty and the leadership amendment on the matter of the defense of the canal and the maintenance of its neutrality.

That would mean that the leadership amendment is deficient in at least the three areas:

The first area is the most important area. That is that the authors of the amendment apparently overlook an important fact. At the time it comes into full and complete operation, even though it becomes effective at the same time as the Panama Canal Treaty does it really takes effect on January 1, 2000, because the Panama Canal Treaty provides for defense of the canal by the United States up to the year 2000. It overlooks—and I am surprised that this was done as it was based, I am told, on the memorandum agreed to between President Carter and Dictator Torrijos and, in effect, embodies those provisions—it overlooks the fact that at the time it goes into operation all of the troops of the United States will have been withdrawn from the Canal Zone under the treaty. How are we going to defend the canal if there are no troops there?

The leadership amendment gives the right to defend, to maintain neutrality, but in a moment I will point out that Dictator Torrijos has a different interpretation of that. How are we going to defend the canal if we do not have any troops there, unless we bring in some troops?

How are we going to bring in some troops except by invasion of that tiny country?

I feel free to criticize this amendment inasmuch as I am a cosponsor of the amendment, and, naturally, being a cosponsor of the amendment I want to examine it and I want to confess as to its shortcomings. I pointed out one of the shortcomings.

The second shortcoming is that it provides that in no event, as we seek to defend the canal to maintain its neutrality, are we going to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama, either under the present regime or a successor regime, which might be a Communist regime, or a Cuban-backed regime, even though that regime may be the very regime that is blocking our access to the canal.

We cannot do anything, under the leadership amendment, which would interfere with the internal affairs of Panama.

Well, that is the second deficiency.

There is a third deficiency, and these are three deficiencies which occur to me off the top, so to speak. I am sure if we examine the amendment further we can note other shortcomings.

The highly vaunted provision that in an emergency our warships can go to the head of the line is the third deficiency. That is highly deficient in that it does not describe, or does not define, what an emergency is, and who decides that there is an emergency. What might be an emergency to us in our country might not be an emergency to Panama. Panama is going to be in control of the canal. I would think that Panama would determine whether there was an emergency.

What will we do, radio to Panama and say, "Look, we have an emergency here and we want to move our ships to the head of the line," with the Panamanians replying, "Well, we don't feel that there is an emergency. What are you talking about, an emergency? You stay where you are, at the rear of the line, and wait your turn."

What would we be able to do to counter that?

I feel at the proper time an amendment needs to be offered to the leadership amendment saying that what constitutes an emergency will lie in the sole judgment of the United States.

Getting back to the amendment which the Senator from Alabama has offered, and which is made necessary, Mr. President, by the deficiencies in the leadership amendment in that there is a hiatus on defense created by the departure of our troops prior to the year 2000 and the start up of the defense rights given under the leadership amendment starting with the year 2000, again I say, when I have made that statement in the past the distinguished proponents of the treaties have pointed out that this goes into effect at the same time as the other treaty, but it is certainly an overlapping situation because the United States, even under the Panama Canal Treaty, would have the right to defend the canal.

One of the arguments the proponents of the Neutrality Treaty made about insisting on considering first the Neutrality Treaty was that they could not vote for the Panama Canal Treaty before the neutrality provision had been agreed to. Well, that is an excuse rather than a valid reason, because, with 78 sponsors of the leadership amendment, the proponents of the treaties know full well that if the Panama Canal Treaty were up for consideration, it would be a very simple thing to insert a provision that the Panama Canal Treaty would not become effective until the Neutrality Treaty had been agreed to. There is no great hurry, you know, because, as I say, the Neutrality Treaty really does not go into effect for 22 years. So we would have 22 years to work on it.

Is the Neutrality Treaty in danger of being defeated? I think not, when 78 Senators, apparently, support it. I would feel that it is in no danger whatsoever.

And the leadership amendment is in no danger whatsoever. I shall vote for the leadership amendment when it comes to an up or down vote on it. It is my obligation, I feel, to do so as long as I am a cosponsor. If I ever decide that I cannot vote for it, and I do not see how that situation could arise, I would ask that my name be removed as a cosponsor of the leadership amendment. I believe we can improve on it.

Following the same line of reasoning as the proponents of the treaties, that they cannot vote for the Panama Canal Treaty until the Neutrality Treaty has been agreed to, I think, then, that we need to establish the fact that we can maintain a military presence in the Panama Canal Zone after the year 2000 if the President certifies that maintaining that presence, or continuing that presence, is necessary for the defense of the canal or maintaining its neutrality.

So, let us establish that right off the bat. Let us not wait on the leadership amendment. Let us supply that deficiency right now.

Why should Senators refuse to agree to this amendment? I do not know that they will. I hope they will not. I do not see why the Senate will not be in favor of adding security to the defense of the canal, providing a way for us to defend it. That ought to be something that would meet the approval of both sides, that the United States might be allowed to continue its military presence in what was and what is now the Panama Canal Zone.

Why would they object to it? Well, they would not object to it, Mr. President, except for the reason—and this point is going to be made time and time again here, on the floor—they would not object to it, and the only reason that the amendment will be turned down in the Senate, if it is turned down, is that Dictator Torrijos would not want it. There again, Mr. President, I think that, in time, the American people are going to realize that the strategy of the proponents of the treaties is to adopt their ineffectual defense amendment and stonewall as to other substantial amendments.

Why? Not because they are not in the best interests of the United States, but because Dictator Torrijos says no.

Now, Mr. President, it is the function of the U.S. Senate to give its advice and consent to the President with respect to treaties. But I fear—and subsequently events are going to see if the fears of the Senator from Alabama are well founded—I fear that we are going to be concerned primarily with whether the amendment meets the approval of Mr. Torrijos. Already, the Foreign Relations Committee has done a flip-flop at the behest of the State Department to the feared objections by Panamanians, when they reversed the action they had already taken on the leadership amendments, having put these amendments in the form of a new article or articles. The State Department advised the Foreign Relations Committee—and this information was brought before the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), a member of the committee—the State Department advised the Foreign Relations Committee, “You must not handle this amendment or these amendments in this fashion. The Panamanians won’t like it. You must not have a separate article. You have got to amend existing articles. That is the only way they will take it. They won't like it."

So, what did the Foreign Relations Committee do? Why, they got in line and danced to the tune that was played for them.

They reconsidered their earlier action and then prepared amendments to articles IV and VI.

I suppose the reason that the Panamanians did not like it as a separate article was that they feared they might cause the calling of another plebiscite.

I am advised, and I am no Spanish authority, but I am advised that the word "amendment" in English translated over into Spanish comes up "emmienda" which is a minor change, whereas the addition of a new article would be "reforma" which is a major change, even though the language might be the same, but put in one as an amendment and one as new articles.

So the Foreign Relations Committee did reverse what had been done and handled it as the State Department said would be more pleasing to the Panamanians.

I am a little bit tired, Mr. President, of wondering what Mr. Torrijos will think about amendments being considered here in the U.S. Senate rather than worrying about whether they are for the best interest of the United States and her people.

I have asked and obtained unanimous consent that all Senators who do care to cosponsor the amendment will be allowed to add their names at the desk as if they were on the amendment at the time of its introduction.

What it does is to supply an omission that the leadership has, that is, it does retain to the United States the option of continuing the military presence of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone beyond December 31, 1999, if the President deems that it is necessary for the defense of the canal or for maintaining its neutrality, and if he so certifies to the Panamanian Government prior to December 31, 1999.

Statements have been made here on the floor that the last, at least four Presidents, I believe, I am not sure they said five, but certainly they have said the last four Presidents have favored the Panama Canal treaties.

That being so, is there any reason to believe that the President of the United States in the year 1999 would not look with as much favor on the change in the setup regarding the operation or defense of the Panama Canal, that that President, the President in 1999, would not deem it necessary to continue military presence there unless there was a real need to do so in order to defend the canal or to maintain its neutrality?

Because, Mr. President, we do not know what condition, the governmental condition, the human rights situation, the state of belligerency or hostility to the United States, might exist in Panama on December 31, 1999.

This amendment would give the President the option of continuing our military presence.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) on Monday said:

Well, this amendment is not necessary. It is superfluous. It is already covered in the leadership amendment.

Well, it is not covered in the leadership amendment. All we have to do is read the leadership amendment to see that it is not, read the leadership amendment in the light of any provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty.

He said on the floor that the President would be authorized to retain troops in Panama, in the Panama Canal Zone, under the leadership amendment. But I do not believe that is maintained in the record itself.

I believe he was claiming too much for the provisions of the leadership amendment on the floor and, possibly, on reflection realized that that provision was not there.

But if it is provided in the leadership amendment, what is wrong with underscoring that fact?

Could we not tell Mr. Torrijos, "Well, it's already in what you have agreed to, we just felt like it was a good idea to nail it down."

Mr. President, another reason the leadership amendment is inadequate is the memorandum between the President of the United States and Dictator Torrijos, not signed, agreed to by them in October, I believe, when there was a hue and cry for changing the treaties to give us better defense rights, and the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) to his eternal credit, was one of the Senators who said that the original treaties did not give us adequate defense rights. He said that it had to be changed and his objection and objections of other Senators caused the President and Dictator Torrijos to enter into this unsigned memorandum.

But what did Dictator Torrijos say that the memorandum, unsigned agreement between him and President Carter, would do? He said that it would give the United States the duty, but not the right, to come into Panama to defend the canal, that they have no right to come in unless he calls for them and that if he called for them, they had the duty to come and defend it. Not the right.

What about all this talk about unilateral right? That is not the way Dictator Torrijos interprets it. The leadership amendment is based largely on this memorandum. Maybe he said that his mind has been changed by negotiation with the U.S. negotiators, but I have not seen any retraction. Maybe it has been there; and if it has, I am sure that information will be supplied, where Torrijos has backed up on his assessment of the effect of the memorandum between him and President Carter. So if an amendment is susceptible of two radically different constructions, there is something wrong with the amendment.

That is another reason why we need to spell out the fact that if the President deems it necessary to continue our military presence in Panama beyond the 31st of December, 1999, he can continue that military presence, provided he so certifies to the Panamanian Government. Why should we not have that right?

The big hue and cry by the proponents of the amendment was that the treaties did not give adequate right to defend the canal at the end of this century. I think it is quite obvious that the leadership amendment is deficient at that point, because it sets up a regime under which all of our troops have to be withdrawn from the Canal Zone, and we would have to invade Panama in order to defend the canal. While invading Panama, even though Panama were the culprit, we could not do anything to interfere with their internal affairs. In other words, we could not cause the deposing of a dictator or anything of that sort. We have to leave that regime unscathed, under the leadership amendment. Leave Panama alone. Leave the dictatorship alone. Do not tamper with that. We are agreeing to that, under the leadership amendment.

Mr. President, all we are trying to do with this amendment is to provide for a better defense of the Panama Canal, starting with the year 2000, only if the President of the United States says that continuing that military presence is necessary in order to defend the canal or to preserve its neutrality.

Very few I have talked to have voiced disagreement with the logic of this amendment or the fact that it does fill a hiatus that is contained or not contained in the leadership amendment. This is the logical place to put this provision. It does not bother article I at all, in that, while it is stricken, it is brought back in, word for word with this proviso, giving the President this power.

The amendment does not make it mandatory that we maintain a military presence there. It is not at all certain that we will. But who could object to allowing the President to continue that military presence if it is necessary to defend the canal or to maintain its neutrality?

Mr. President, I will close my remarks at this time. I probably will have other remarks to make prior to a final vote on the amendment.

As I have stated, the leadership has assured me that no effort will be made to table the amendment this week and that such effort would not be made until next week, after an opportunity has been given to the Senate to fully debate this issue.

Is it to the best interests of the United States, in its desire to defend the Panama Canal? How could anyone question it? Is it needed? The leadership amendment does not cover it. Why, then should there be any doubt about the Senate agreeing to the amendment? Mr. Torrijos might not like it. It might cause the calling of another plebiscite.

Mr. President, I believe that we in the U.S. Senate should be more concerned with preserving and protecting the security of the United States and the Panama Canal than we should be concerned with the wishes of Mr. Torrijos or whether or not he has to call another plebiscite. Who knows whether he is going to call another plebiscite? He is a one-man government down there. He might say that the people have no right to act on this thing again. I do not know. Would we say to him, "You have to call a plebiscite," if he says one is not necessary? What control do we have over it?

One U.S. Senator told me, when I asked him if he would support a constructive, substantive amendment, that he would support no amendment that would cause plebiscite in Panama.

Mr. President, I believe we should add all amendments that are necessary to protect the interests of the United States and add a provision to these treaties that, in order to become effective, they have to be approved by a plebiscite in Panama. Do not wonder about whether Torrijos is going to call one or not, because he will not call it unless he wants to, and he says it is not necessary. Would we take issue? We would not. Torrijos says that it is not necessary to call a plebiscite.

We should write in the treaty itself—and I assure Senators that before these treaties are agreed to, such an amendment will be offered—we should add an amendment that these treaties become effective only when approved by the people of Panama in another plebiscite called for that purpose.

I have had suggestions by people throughout the country who are opposed to the Panama Canal treaties, who have pointed out that Panama is a dictatorship.

The people of Panama were given the opportunity to express themselves on the matter of agreeing to these treaties. Yet the United States, the world's greatest democracy, has no such provision. And it has been suggested to me that an amendment ought to be offered providing that the treaties not become effective until they have been approved in a referendum submitted to the qualified voters of the United States.

I have rejected every such suggestion and I would not support such an amendment, because the Members of the U.S. Senate in our representative form of government represent the people of the United States in this Chamber. And it is our duty and our responsibility to act in this matter. This is not something that we need to send back to the people in a referendum even though I know within reason that the people would turn down the Panama Canal Treaty. And with its fall naturally the Neutrality Treaty would fall. But I do not believe that is the proper approach. I do wish Senators would listen a little more to their constituents in making their decision on whether to give advice and consent to the President for the approval of these treaties. I believe if they did that we would have a pretty heavy vote in the Senate against these treaties, because I am convinced the people are opposed to them. But I recognize the right of Senators to use their own independent judgment in deciding these matters.

Fortunately, in my own particular case I made my considered judgment in this matter and I announced my position in a newsletter to some of my constituents back home in October 1971, my opposition to giving the Panama Canal away. So my position in this matter was reached after careful consideration, study, and reflection long before it became an issue among the people of Alabama. So I am in the happy position, Mr. President, of being opposed to the treaties on an independent judgment backed by public opinion in my State, and backed by public opinion throughout the Nation, in my judgment.

So, I do not look with favor on a referendum on this subject submitted to the qualified voters of the United States.

But in Panama that is the procedure that they seemed to have established under their constitution. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel since it is in Panama the established procedure under their "constitution"—I put that in quotes—that the people will be allowed to decide this question, so what you might call the court of last resort in Panama on this question is the people, just as the court of last resort with regard to the treaties here in the United States is the Senate of the United States unless the President will follow the provisions of article IV, section 3, paragraph 2 of the Constitution, that would require that any measure or provision disposing of property of the United States must be enacted by both Houses of Congress and not just the Senate.

But as regards the treaty itself, leaving out the question of disposition of property in which the House of Representatives properly should join, the Senate is the court of last resort regarding the treaties. So we are not going to vote, Mr. President, on this issue until all the amendments have been made, if the majority opinion in the Senate will allow us to have amendments, and we are going to determine in the next few days how interested the majority thought here in the Senate is in amending these treaties in a constructive fashion to give better protection to the interests of the United States. So it is only right, proper, and fair that another plebiscite be held down there. Why did Torrijos jump the gun by calling the plebiscite before the U.S. Senate had determined what the provisions of the treaty would be?

The people cannot give advance approval to something that is not even in existence, that is, the completed treaty. They should not have been called on to act on the treaty until it had gone through this deliberative process in the U.S. Senate wherein we give our advice, Mr. President, as well as our consent.

So these are some of my reasons for feeling that the leadership amendment is defective and right at the start as we consider this Neutrality Treaty, which embodies as well the defense of the canal, right at the start so we can feel some security as we go forward with the amendment process, right at the start we are going to know that the President of the United States can, if he deems it necessary for the defense of the canal or for maintaining its neutrality, keep such military presence that we have or as we feel that we need in the Panama Canal Zone. So it is with these thoughts, Mr. President, that I leave to the Senate its decision with respect to the need for this amendment.

I yield the floor at this time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

MR. CHURCH. Mr. President, the amendment now offered by the able Senator from Alabama would provide for a continued American military presence in Panama after the year 2000, if the President of the United States deemed it necessary for the defense of the canal or the maintenance of the neutrality thereof.

I said earlier that I felt this amendment is superfluous and unnecessary, because under the leadership amendment, recommended to the Senate by the Foreign Relations Committee, the United States retains the right in perpetuity to unilaterally use its military forces to safeguard the canal and preserve its neutrality.

That being the case, I see no reason to add to the text of the treaty the amendment offered by the able Senator. As a matter of fact, if the Senate were to adopt such an amendment, it would, in my opinion, wreck the treaty.

The American military occupation of a strip of land 10 miles wide and 50 miles long dividing the tiny Republic of Panama into two parts has been the central point of discontent of the Panamanian people for generations. Our agreement to a fixed date, December 31, 1999, for ending our military presence in Panama, was the key point which allowed us to gain the many advantages in these treaties that assure us of a canal that is open, neutral, and efficiently run for our use, indefinitely.

As long ago as 1936, President Franklin Roosevelt recognized that the Panama Canal is more secure with a friendly relationship with Panama—something far more important to the security of the canal than our insistence on maintaining an armed camp of American soldiers in the canal zone.

Mr. President, opponents of these treaties like to compare the Panama Canal, or the zone, and our military presence in it with our naval base in Guantanamo, Cuba. I think it is worth comparing.

In Guantanamo, where we preserve our military presence in a hostile environment, we must maintain constant military patrols around the clock, gun emplacements, and high fences around the few miles that separate the base from Castro's Cuba. To have to do that in the Canal Zone, and to maintain such concentrated military forces along a strip of land which stretches 50 miles through jungle terrain across the Isthmus, would be an enormous burden.

Moreover, as our own generals have testified, such an effort could not guarantee a secure canal. We are far better off with a friendly Panama cooperating with us in the canal's defense.

Mr. President, we have a friendly government and a friendly people in Panama today, which is ironic considering how passionately they feel about their right to have jurisdiction over their own land. But that good will exists in large part because we agree in principle, in 1965, to a fixed date for the termination of our military presence in Panama. We did that when Presidents Johnson and Robles agreed to negotiate a new treaty. The consistent acceptance of this principle through four administrations in the United States has inspired the hope and sustained the good will of the Panamanian people toward us. It is their expectation that we will fulfill those commitments which preserve their good will toward us today.

The adoption by the Senate of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama would dash that hope. It would undermine and destroy the basis on which the Panamanian people expect to have their dignity restored. If that happens, then I believe with all of my conviction the attitude toward us in Panama will change radically and overnight, and we will have destroyed, by our own act, the spirit of cooperation and friendly partnership which still exists in Panama.

To maintain the canal, having destroyed that spirit of friendship and cooperation, would present grave difficulties; indeed, it would mean that we would have to convert the Canal Zone into the kind of armed camp that we now maintain in Guantanamo.

In my judgment, Mr. President, this would be a foolish thing to do; not simply unnecessary and undesirable, but foolish. It would create a problem for us that does not now exist, and for what reason? The leadership amendment makes it abundantly plain that if at any time in the future an actual threat to the canal materializes, whether it comes from internal forces or external forces, the United States shall have the right to take such military action as may be necessary to meet that threat. So the real security interests of the United States are preserved by the leadership's amendment.

There is no good reason to undermine and destroy the friendship and good will which presently exists in Panama, by reneging on our commitment and restore Panama to the Panamanians.

Furthermore, there is no reason to believe we will need military bases in Panama in the next century. Consequently, to now impose this proposition on the people of Panama would destroy this moment which has long eluded us, to put our interests in the canal on the firm footing of a cooperative, friendly relationship with the country where it is located.

That is the promise offered by these treaties. We must not jeopardize that promise by adopting amendments of the kind offered today by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I have nothing further to say this evening. If there is no objection, I would like to have a call for a quorum in order that the majority leader may come for whatever concluding remarks he may have.

Mr. LAXALT. If I may, I would like to make a concluding remark or two to recap the day.

Mr. CHURCH. Very well. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank the Senator from Idaho. I think we have had a rather productive day today on the part of the U.S. Senate. We have inquired into many interesting aspects of this treaty.

Senator Goldwater spoke at length about the constitutional ramifications, including the second house rule.

Senator Allen has eloquently related to the Senate the reasons why we should support his amendment. I concur in his amendment.

The thrust of Senator Church's remarks, for the proponents, have been consistently along this line, that the so-called leadership amendments do the job. As has been pointed out, they lead the way but they do not actually give us the means to accomplish our ends in the event we have difficulty with the Panamanians.

This has all been premised on the fact that somehow, by signing these treaties, we are going to end up in having a completely tranquil and peaceful relationship with the Panamanians for the next 23 years, and beyond. Yet there is every chance—and I hope this will not be the case—that our experience under these treaties will lead to further difficulties.

Senator Stennis indicated today in his very edifying report that not only will this treaty cost us money, but it could cost up to $2 billion of American taxpayer funds.

Of more importance than that, he cited fears that the enactment of these treaties under the present provisions could open up as many as seven serious areas of financial difficulty. Any one of those could be a continuing festering sore of the type which has been referred to constantly on the Senate floor.

No one of us on this floor today can reasonably speculate as to what the military situation is going to be on December 31, 1999, not one of us. No one of us has that kind of looking glass. I wish we did.

The Allen amendment does not make a military presence automatic. Many of us would prefer that it be automatic, because many of us agree with the testimony of the former Joint Chiefs, and other eminent military people, who tell us that continuing to control and manage the Panama Canal is of vital strategic importance to the Hemisphere and to this country itself.

Under the terms of this amendment, it seems to me, if reasonably applied—and it would be because it requires a certification and a finding on the part of the President that our continuing military presence is necessary to our national security—it is perfectly consistent with the posture and obligation that we have under the leadership amendment to protect the canal and guard the neutrality. I see nothing inconsistent in it.

Surely, the Panamanians would probably dearly love to have us out of there, some of them, but I know many thinking Panamanians who, if they are confronted with difficulty, would dearly love to have us there, and not in an outsider position. As a practical matter, if we leave Panama at the end of 1999 and go into a total withdrawal situation, and if an occasion arises where there is hostility, we are going to be required to invade the country of Panama. That would be an ugly situation from every standpoint. That would be in order to fulfill our obligations under the leadership amendment.

It is my judgment that if we could continue to maintain a reasonable military presence within the country of Panama it will not only safeguard our obligations under this treaty, but it will safeguard our security and, in addition, safeguard the interests of the Panamanians. After all, they simply do not have the wherewithal, nor will they reasonably have it, to properly protect that facility without our help and assistance. They will not.

It would seem to me if I were in a position of leadership in Panama it would not be an affront to me at all to have the President of this country, an invaluable ally, make a finding and a certification that our continued presence would be required there, and if that finding were made then we would have a reasonable military presence.

It is my judgment, Mr. President, that this amendment is vital, it is proper, and it may be absolutely necessary in order to safeguard the implementation of the provisions of the leadership amendment. It is my judgment that it is entirely reasonable. I would hope when we take a vote on this the first of the week my colleagues would find it appropriate to support Senator Allen's amendment.

I ask unanimous consent at this time that I be included as a cosponsor of the amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank my colleague for yielding the time.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record at this point a compilation of certain statements on these treaties by U.S. military leaders, primarily taken from testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

RESIDUAL BASE REQUIREMENTS

Admiral James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "From the briefings and information presented to the Joint Chiefs of Staff during our discussions of the Panama Canal Treaties, I concluded that Panama would not accept a treaty without the provision that all U.S. armed forces would be withdrawn after a certain date, about the year 2000. It was my personal view that although a post-2000 presence was desirable, there was a greater net gain to be achieved by having the Treaties as they are today than no treaties at all. Although a U.S. military presence after the year 2000 is excluded, it is more important to have the Panamanians sharing in the defense of the Canal, cooperating in the operation of the waterway, and working to create a favorable environment for the defense of the Canal than not having new Treaties, which almost certainly would have been the case had our side insisted on an indefinite U.S. military presence." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

General Louis H. Wilson, USMC, Commandant of the Marine Corps: "Now, I must be frank with you. I agree that it would be easier and less costly to meet threats after 1999 if the U.S. were to maintain forces in Panama beyond that time. I do not believe, however, that successful defense of the Canal is dependent upon continued U.S. military presence in Panama. With the capability of the Navy and Marine Corps to provide an amphibious task force—to steam within a few miles of either end of the Canal, a meaningful U.S. presence—for all practical purposes—is assured." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "The change in position on post year 2000 base rights was an evolutionary process and not a last minute decision. Because of the realization that the question of a post-2000 US military presence was not acceptable to Panama, the formula for the Neutrality Treaty with no expiration date and a U.S.-Panamanian commitment to protect and defend the canal and assure its permanent neutrality was devised." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, pg. 119, Response to a question from Senator Thurmond)

"I became convinced over a period of several years' discussions that there was no chance of arriving at any kind of a treaty with Panama on the Canal, if the U.S. were to insist upon a presence in Panama into the indefinite future."

"I decided that if we were to have a treaty there had to be a specific date prescribed at which U.S. presence would be withdrawn." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, pg. 29, Response to a question from Chairman Stennis)

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "• • • that obviously in purely military terms it would be far simpler and less costly to discharge any defense responsibilities that we might exercise under the neutrality treaty to retain a base of operations in Panama, probably Howard Air Force Base as a minimum, but that does not say that without that base or any base there that we are incapable of doing what conceivably we might have to do at any point in the future."

"We have the knowledge, the techniques, the equipment to put a force into any place where we don't have a base. It is just more costly and more difficult." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, pg. 128, in response to a question from Senator Case)

Adm. Robert L. J. Long, USN, Vice Chief of Naval Operations: "Subsequent to the year 2000, we believe that there is sufficient authority in the treaty for the United States to act in any way that it deems necessary to assure continued neutrality and use of the canal." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, pg. 128, in response to a question from Senator Case)

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, USA (ret), former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "This Hemisphere and its approaches constitute our home base. If we can't control all military aircraft and vessels approaching our vital areas, there is something wrong with our Armed Forces." (SFRC Hearings, 10 Oct 77, Pg. 69 (Part 3), in response to a question from Senator Percy regarding ability of the US to defend the approaches to the canal by positioning forces outside the neutrality area).

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "As I said, my initial position is, I would like to see the United States stay in Panama in perpetuity, both to defend and operate the canal and having the Panamanians want us there. That is not the real life situation that prevails. The Panamanians don't want us there.

I believe that the best we can do is to have the Panama Canal Treaty and Neutrality Treaty which provide us with a presence to the year 2000, and subsequent to that time to have the right of taking whatever action necessary to permit our use of the canal. The price we pay for that, I believe, is to give up our bases." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, Pg. 84, in response to a question from Senator Nunn).

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "As I have indicated in testimony, a residual US presence was always considered preferable in order to facilitate reinforcement for the protection of the Panama Canal and to provide a logistics base for other contingencies. Because it was recognized that this was unacceptable to Panama, the formulation of the Neutrality Treaty was devised in order to permanently protect U.S. defense interests." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, Pg. 118, in response to a question from Senator Thurmond).

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations. (Continued): "Yes, that would be my initial military objective because we are better off with a base in that part of the world than without a base. However, I thought it was more important to have these two treaties than it was to have a base in perpetuity in Panama." (SASC Hearing, 24 Jan 78, Pg. 118, in response to a question from Chairman Stennis).

CANAL DEFENSE

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "Our capability to defend the Panama Canal will be enhanced through cooperation with the Government of Panama. The new treaty provides a basis for such cooperation between the United States and Panama. The alliance relationship should develop and strengthen during the life of the Panama Canal Treaty, and be further enhanced by the neutrality treaty." (Opening Statement, SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 99)

Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: "The Panama Canal Treaty establishes a concept of defense which includes United States and Panamanian forces operating cooperatively to defend the canal. Indeed, the most effective defense of the canal can be obtained in conjunction with a friendly Panama.

"We expect that the Panamanian armed forces: that is, the Guardia Nacional, will contribute military units to canal defense, and that they will train with our forces in appropriate canal defense tasks. The concept for combined defense which I have recommended to the Joint Chiefs of Staff envisions the continued presence of American forces in the vicinity of the canal for the term of U.S. control of canal operations, not only to assist in defense of the canal, but also to provide protection of U.S. lives and property. Under this concept, certain types of military facilities are essential to support the U.S. forces committed to canal defense. These include the major airfield, cantonment areas for stationing of forces in close proximity to the canal, training areas, communications facilities, piers and docks, logistic support facilities, and family housing. These essential facilities are provided for in the Panama Canal Treaty and its implementing agreements.

"It is apparent that the Panama Canal Treaty will require the relocation of a few U. S. military units from their present locations in the Canal Zone to other locations within selected U. S. military defense sites in Panama. These consolidations will not adversely affect our capability to defend the canal and in fact in many ways contribute to a more efficient operation.

"The Primary defense responsibility and the presence of U. S. military forces in Panama together with the provisions of the neutrality guarantee adequately protect the security interests of the United States. When these factors are combined with a cooperative defense effort by the Government of Panama and its armed forces, they even more adequately provide for the security interests of the United States." (Opening Statement, SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 103)

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "I mentioned that in the absolute worst case in a typical school solution such as at Fort Leavenworth, Command and General Staff College, it probably would come out to about one corps or three divisions plus supporting units or about 100,000 troops. The second statement went to a consideration of, could we prevent an act of sabotage against the canal, and I have said no. I thought a well-trained, highly determined person or small team bent on sabotage could disrupt the operation of the canal, but I thought for a short period of time. For instance, I don't think such a team could destroy the dam and loose the waters which would take, after the dam was rebuilt, 2 years to fill the reservoirs, because that is a major undertaking—to destroy a dam of that size—but to disrupt the operation of a lock, to cause a landslide, these types of things could happen." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 132, in response to a question from Senator Church regarding Canal security assurances)

Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: "In my judgment our capability to keep the canal open and in use for our country and for the countries of the free world will be enhanced, considerably enhanced, by the provisions of the treaty. I say that because of the factors that I enumerated in my prepared statement. The heart of it is really having a friendly environment around the canal in which to operate, and we can do all of our defense tasks better in a friendly rather than hostile environment." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Pages 132-133, in response to a question from Senator Church regarding impact of treaties on Canal defense)

Hon. Harold Brown, Secretary of Defense: "The present canal arrangements include a treaty between the United States and Britain, the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, in which we undertake a regime of neutrality—but, in fact, now and under the future canal treaty—under these canal treaties, belligerents are permitted to send their ships through the canal. I found out yesterday for the first time that there is an arrangement by which they are not allowed through simultaneously in opposite or the same direction, but it is a fact, I think, that the United States attempt to prevent ships of a nation belligerent to us, at war with us, from transiting the canal would be made outside the canal. We would depend upon our military power in the approaches to the canal and further out to do what we had to do.

"The last place we want to sink a ship—ours or anyone else's—is in the canal, and we will therefore depend upon our military power outside of the canal to serve our interests. The new treaties do guarantee passage through the canal. They don't guarantee passage to the canal, to us or to anyone else." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 137, in response to a question from Senator Percy on ship transits under the neutrality treaty)

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "On the sabotage, then, the way we could handle it is with a very heavy investment of troops and with an acceptance of some rather extensive offensive operations to trace these people down. Now my statement was that this still would not guarantee that there would not be temporary interruptions or disruptions throughout the canal. But I think that we could still put ships through there. We have the right to inspect ships except naval and auxiliary vessels which may be surveyed to assure safe and sanitary transit. I think we could do it.

"I feel that if this country is willing to make the sacrifice and to become involved in that sort of business, we certainly have the means to do it. Investment would be heavy, but I think the investment in the sort of things we sought to shake off from our experience in Vietnam could come right back to us. But I would hate to see it." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Pages 178-179, in response to a question from Senator Clark concerning defensibility of the Canal)

DIFFICULTY OF DEFENDING CANAL

Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: "The forces presently available to me to carry out the mission of canal defense are well trained and capable of implementing a wide range of defense tasks to protect the canal and also to protect U.S. lives and property. They are not capable without reinforcement from the United States of protecting the canal from a major external threat. Although we could not insure the uninterrupted operation of the canal in such a hostile environment, it is my firm conviction that under the most likely threats we can limit such interruptions to ones of short duration." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan. 78, Page 23)

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: " * * * In a nuclear war, defense of the Canal would be virtually impossible, in that it can be targeted by ballistic missiles against which there is no effective defense."

" * * * However, the defense of the Canal in a non-nuclear war would depend largely on the Navy's ability to control its sea approaches." " * * * Therefore, U.S. Navy capabilities to defend the approaches of the Canal are adequate to provide me with reasonable confidence that its defense against an external conventional threat is practical."

"The second threat to our continued use of the Canal is the internal danger of either local guerrilla activities or the opposition of regular Panamanian forces. Defending successfully against such threats in the formidable jungle terrain of the Canal area would be extremely difficult, particularly in view of the vulnerability of the lock system. Relatively minor damage to critical mechanical components could easily disrupt Canal operations. Defense against a persistent and determined internal opponent would be especially difficult, and uninterrupted operation of the Canal could not be guaranteed. Therefore, the cooperation of the local populations, the Panamanians and Central Americans, reduces the probability of active dissidence and greatly enhances the defense of the Canal. These treaties, which make the Panamanians our direct partners in the defense of the Canal, will contribute substantially to friendly and cooperative relations with all of our Latin American neighbors, and further improve the defensibility of the Canal." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan. 78, Pages 12-14)

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "• • • the Panamanians resent our presence and I am convinced that it is going to be difficult to defend the Canal against disruption—note I say defend the Canal from disruption, vice defend the Canal from destruction on seizure—it is going to be extremely difficult to defend the Canal from disruption with a hostile population and with the Canal being as vulnerable as it is to minor acts of sabotage." (Statement, SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, Page 19)

Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: "However, even with the sizable force, or a larger one, I would say that unless extraordinary measures are permitted, such as moving across the national boundaries, there is no way that I could prevent the interruption of that canal, and the reason I say that, if I may use an illustration, the Canal Zone boundary is only 5 miles from the center line of canal. The exceptions are in the lake area. One can easily visualize, again, if there is a hostile Panama, visualize the use of standoff weapons only 5 miles away, and they wouldn't have to hit very much in the canal or in the Canal Zone, but they would terrorize the employees and probably stop commercial shipping, and that is whether they sink a ship or not.

"So these are the kinds of things I say could not be prevented regardless of the size of the force that is there now." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan. 78, Page 37, in response to a question from Senator McIntyre concerning number of troops required to defend the Canal.)

"The other thing I think to reiterate is that these forces are designed, in my judgment, to protect the Canal, that is, to keep it from being destroyed; but, again, I could not give a high assurance that the Canal operation would remain uninterrupted even with those kinds of force augmentations." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan. 78, Page 49, in response to a question from Senator Anderson concerning the size of augmentation forces required to defend the Canal.)

"• • • I think I could assure that the Canal is not destroyed, that is, rendered useless, where you couldn't do anything with it; but I think that it would be virtually impossible to keep transiting ships from being stopped or harassed or at least ship transits interrupted." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan. 78, Page 82, in response to a question from Senator Nunn regarding force augmentation sufficiency.)

"The duration of such an augmentation is difficult to come to. I would say, however, that if you are looking at a hostile Panama with guerrilla forces, insurgency-type operations present, it won't go away in a year, maybe a couple of years. So I would say a minimum of a year and perhaps extendable year by year, so to speak.

"It would cost something like $17 million to deploy a force of the magnitude I have been indicating. In other words, 40,000 or 50,000 troops, and it would take about $22 million or so per annum, per year, there just to maintain them in an offshore area, namely, in a place like Panama. So then you would be looking at some $20 million per year thereafter to maintain the additional force.

"The deployment, of course, would be one time there and then you would face the cost of bringing them back." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan. 78, Page 55, in response to a question from Senator Hart regarding the size/cost of augmentation forces to meet a major internal threat.)

Adm. James L. Holloway, III, U.S. Navy, Chief of Naval Operations: "I do think that there is a possibility that civil unrest could develop to the point where we would be essentially unable to keep the people under control. I think the point has been made that it is very difficult to handle mobs of students and unarmed citizens with soldiers with helmets and bayonets. I don't think that it is impossible to hold on to the canal. I think that the circumstances could be such that the United States simply wouldn't have the stomach for it, and that we would make hasty arrangements under great duress and pressure in those circumstances and get out under less favorable conditions than if we plan now to leave in the year 2000 with the right of protecting our interests there in the future." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan. 78, Page 76, in response to a question from Senator Cannon regarding possibility that civil unrest would force the U.S. to withdraw prematurely before year 2000.)

Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: "In the main, Senator, you are correct. All of those points that you have made as to the strength and durability of that canal are absolutely correct.

"When you get down to what kind of damage can be done by someone with a grenade or similarly a small explosive force, you have to wonder where he would place it. If he were trying to do some damage to the major locks, or to one of the major dams, or even to one of the so-called saddle dams, the answer is, very little damage at all, in fact, almost negligible.

"But if you are talking about some of the more sensitive control mechanisms on back a way from the canal and some of the power stations and communications points, then you could do damage and what that would do is not necessarily close down the canal but could limit its operation for maybe several hours or even several days. So you could disrupt operations to some extent." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, Page 116, in response to a question from Senator Garn regarding size of operation required to disable the canal)

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, USA (ret), former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "Well, we had examples of popular demonstrations against the canal in the past. I would fear any place in Latin America that becomes or where there is a pool of resentment and discontent which gives of our troublemaking friends in the Kremlin an opportunity to look for the troubled waters in which to fish. It is so easy even if there were a majority in the Panamanian people favorable to our presence to have a dissatisfied minority of sufficient proportions to provide the background within which these subversive activities could take place possibly by commandos fed in small groups from the outside at any time."

"As I conceive the ease of stopping traffic, just imagine the effect of a half dozen determined riflemen who occasionally fire a few shots from the bank at a few ships going by, Lloyds would stop the insurance coverage on every ship going through. The snipers could then go back and wait for a week and then come back. It is the simplest thing in the world to cause that kind of problem. This is not a big military operation but it is certainly enough to impede the operation of the canal intermittently." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, Page 215, in response to a question from Senator McIntyre regarding likelihood of a Panamanian-inspired terrorism)

DEFENSE RIGHTS—NEUTRALITY TREATY

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "The right of the United States to militarily defend our use of the Panama Canal after the year 2000 is premised on the Treaty of Neutrality which guarantees the U.S. the use of the Canal after the year 2000, including the right of expeditious transit, without any restriction as to type of ship, cargo carried, armament, internal operation, or means of propulsion. If access to the Canal is either denied or restricted, the United States, in my view, is not precluded from taking necessary action to ensure continued unrestricted access on an expedited basis. This interpretation of the Treaty of Neutrality was reaffirmed and clarified in the October 14, 1977, Carter-Torrijos Understanding." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, USA (ret), former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: " * * * In case Panama failed to protect the Canal or to keep it in operation, the treaties give the United States the continuing right to take whatever steps it deems necessary, to include military action, even after the year 2000 to restore order and maintain operations by unilateral action. This right will be recognized by the nations signatory to the Treaty protocol—thus assuring that henceforth the United States will not stand alone in any future dispute over the operation or defense of the Canal." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 31 Jan 78)

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "I was satisfied with the language that provided for expeditious passage of U.S. men-of-war. I felt it satisfied our requirement adequately. In the case of reentry, even before the understanding which was developed in October, it was my judgment that the provisions of the Neutrality treaty clearly provided for reentry of U.S. forces, operating in a manner we should determine, if the regime of neutrality were violated. Violations of the regime of neutrality could be failure of our ships to have unimpeded passage or our warships to have expeditious passage, or if any foreign government introduced military facilities, bases or troops into Panama. I was satisfied that if this country had the will to go back in after the year 2000, that legal provisions were there in the treaty for us to do it." (SASC Hearings, 24 Jan 78, Page 39, in response to a question from Senator Thurmond)

Hon. Harold Brown, Secretary of Defense: "When the Panama Canal Treaty expires, as the year 2000 dawns, the neutrality treaty provides that the United States and Panama are to maintain jointly the permanent neutrality of the canal, and that no troops other than Panamanian may be stationed in Panama. The United States is also made a guarantor of the neutrality of the canal. In that capacity, we have the right to take appropriate measures to enforce this guarantee. In my judgment, these provisions insure that the U.S. ability and unilateral right to defend the canal against any external threat remain unimpaired." (Opening Statement before the SFRG, 27 Sep 77, Page 97)

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, USA (ret), former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "I don't find the treaty language obscure or even ambiguous. It says that when a threat to neutrality occurs, Panama and the United States will sit down together and try to work out a joint way of meeting it. If not, the United States will do whatever it deems necessary. I could not ask for greater authority than that." (SFRC Hearings, 10 Oct 77, Page 67 (Part 3), in response to a question from Senator Percy)

DEFENSE RIGHTS—CANAL TREATY

Adm. Elmo Zumwalt, USN, former Chief of Naval Operations: "The cooperation of a favorably disposed government in Panama is needed to provide a reasonable prospect of defending the Canal from an internal threat."

Adm. James L. Holloway, III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "The specific provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty which provide for the defense of the Canal by the United States until the year 2000, and of the Treaty of Neutrality which will guarantee our use of the Canal after the turn of the century, are considered to be adequate to protect national security interests." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Adm. James L. Holloway, III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "The provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty permitting the basing, reinforcing, and maneuvering of U.S. forces in Panama until the year 2000 will facilitate the support of both U.S. forces which remain in Panama and any additional forces which may be reintroduced if required to defend the Canal. These bases provide and will continue to provide important support for naval forces which will defend the approaches to the Canal." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Hon. Harold Brown, Secretary of Defense: "The treaty goes even further, however. It states unequivocally that during the life of the treaty, the U.S. armed forces shall enjoy the right and the primary responsibility to defend the canal itself. It further provides that during that period the United States may station, train, and support units of our armed forces in Panama, and that the United States will decide unilaterally, whether and how to modify the force levels we maintain there. All key military bases and training areas which we now operate in the Canal Zone will remain under U.S. control." (Opening Statement before the SFRC, 27 Sep 77, Page 97)

TREATY ENHANCES GENERAL CANAL SECURITY

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "Defense against a persistent and determined internal opponent would be especially difficult, and uninterrupted operation of the Canal could not be guaranteed. Therefore, the cooperation of the local populations, the Panamanians and Central Americans, reduces the probability of active dissidence and greatly enhances the defense of the Canal. These treaties, which make the Panamanians our direct partners in the defense of the Canal, will contribute substantially to friendly and cooperative relations with all of our Latin American neighbors, and further improve the defensibility of the Canal." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Adm. James L. Holloway III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: " * * * I am convinced that the continuing use of the Panama Canal for national security purposes is best assured through the provisions of the new treaties." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Gen. Louis H. Wilson, USMC, Commandant of the Marine Corps: "The proposed treaties adequately provide for the unimpeded use of the Canal by U.S. vessels as well as for the Canal's continued neutrality and security." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Gen. Louis H. Wilson, USMC, Commandant of the Marine Corps: "Defense of the Canal through 1999, accomplished in a combined and cooperative atmosphere with the Panamanian government, would in my opinion be more effective than under present treaty arrangements, given the attitudes of Panama towards the present treaty and the antagonisms which would very likely develop if those arrangements were to continue." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Adm. E. R. Zumwalt, Jr., USN (ret.): " * * * in my judgment, the ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty by the Senate would enhance, and nonratification by the Senate would harm US security interests." (Letter to the Senate, dated 6 Sep 77)

Gen. M. B. Ridgway, USA (ret), former Commander-in-Chief, Caribbean, and Chief of Staff, U.S. Army: " * * * I am convinced that ratification of these documents is a major, if not a vital U.S. strategic interest." (Letter to SecState, dated 17 Aug 77)

Lt. Gen. D.P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: " * * * Let me say that it is my professional and personal opinion that the proposed treaties adequately provide for the defense of the Canal and the rights of the members of the Armed Forces out to the year 2000; in addition they provide the legal basis for the United States to take such actions as would be necessary to insure Canal neutrality beyond that year." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

EXPEDITIOUS PASSAGE

Hon. Harold Brown, Secretary of Defense: "The neutrality treaty, more formally, the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, provides that the canal shall be open permanently to all vessels of all nations. Moreover, it contains an important additional provision. The United States is given a preferred position with respect to use of the canal, a position which no other country except Panama will enjoy: U.S. vessels of war, and the U.S. auxiliary fleet—important examples of which are oilers and supply ships—are guaranteed rapid transit through the canal. This is so irrespective of the cargo they carry. These provisions assure us that the United States will remain able to use the canal in timely fashion whenever military necessity dictates, just as we can today." (Opening Statement before the SFRC Hearings, 27 Sept. 77, Page 97)

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "We had, very frankly, no concern in the Joint Chiefs of Staff for priority passage for Panamanian naval vessels. We were concerned with U.S. naval vessels. The price we had to pay to get the priority or the expeditious passage of U.S. naval vessels was to accept expeditious passage of Panamanian naval vessels." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 129, in response to a question from Senator Case)

Adm. Robert L. J. Long, USN, Vice Chief of Naval Operations: "It is our understanding, Senator Glenn, that 'expeditious transit' means priority transit." (SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 163, in response to a question from Senator Glenn)

STRATEGIC VALUE OF PANAMA CANAL

Hon. Harold Brown, Secretary of Defense: "Free use of the Canal is essential to assure optimum ability to shift our forces and materiel rapidly between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. That capability enhances our defense posture in both the European and Pacific regions." (Opening Statement before the SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Pages 96-97)

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "The Joint Chiefs of Staff recognize the Panama Canal as a major defense asset, the use of which enhance U.S. capability for timely reinforcement of U.S. forces. The strategic military value of the canal is reflected in our ability to accelerate the shift of military forces and logistic support by sea between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans.

"The strategic value of the canal is not expected to change substantially throughout the life of the new Panama Canal Treaty and beyond, so long as the canal provides the sole means of transiting ships across the American continent." (Opening Statement before the SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Pages 98-99)

Adm. Robert L. J. Long, USN, Vice Chief of Naval Operations: "The Panama Canal is and will remain of major importance to the United States. Its use is a key factor in the Navy's ability to accomplish its responsibilities in connection with essential war plans and other contingencies involving our national security. While I cannot state that loss of the canal would result in the failure of these plans or in the inability of the Navy to carry out these responsibilities, it would certainly make these tasks enormously more difficult. We would be much better off with the use of the canal than without it.

"The importance of the canal to the Navy for defense purposes lies in its assured use, not in its ownership." (Opening Statement before the SFRC Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Pages 100-101)

CREDIBILITY OF JCS

Gen. George S. Brown, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "Our capability to defend the Panama Canal will be enhanced through cooperation with the Government of Panama. I have personally worked very diligently for four years to achieve these treaties. We have worked hard for these treaties because we feel they are right."

Gen. George S. Brown, USAF, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "Senator, I just turned to Secretary Brown to ask if he would mind if I made an unsolicited statement at some point to get this on the record. I thank you for your question. The rules are quite clear and I think understood by all of us that nobody, no senior officer in uniform will remain on active duty and publicly be critical of a Presidential decision. I, in my role as chairman, and other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff will articulate as forcefully and as logically as we can the view the Joint Chiefs of Staff hold on issues of national security, but if the judgment goes against us as it does in many cases, there is nothing in the law that says the President has to accept our advice, but we have to give it.

"We don't go public without leaving active duty first, in doing so. However, the rules are also quite clear that in response to interrogation before a congressional committee that we answer fully and factually. The public record is quite clear where we have been in opposition to a Presidential decision. I can cite two cases. One, and I am sure this come as no surprise, was the B-1. The second was in January, the Joint Chiefs of Staff urged that the President not plan to withdraw the 2nd U.S. Division from Korea unless three things were made part of that program. One was that the drawdown be done in such a manner that the military balance on the peninsula not be disturbed. Second, that we make public a pledge of our continued support of the Mutual Security Treaty with the Republic of Korea, and third, that we remain a Pacific power. Those three conditions the President accepted, and it became part of his program, at which point the Joint Chiefs of Staff endorsed the program."

"So, it is wrong to say that in the case of the Panama Canal we are doing this only because a decision has been made. I have personally worked very diligently for 4 years to achieve these treaties with Ambassador Bunker and subsequently with Ambassador Linowitz also, and as we have testified, the key point that finally found its expression in a treaty of neutrality was conceived within the Defense Department. We have worked hard for this treaty because we feel it is right." (SFRH Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Pages 155-156, in response to a question from Senator Clark)

Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, USA, CINC, United States Southern Command: "Senator, my own personal view is completely consistent with my professional view. Let me say that somewhat similarly to General Brown. Over the past 2 years during which I have been the commander of the Southern Command and stationed in the Panama Canal Zone, I have worked with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and, of course, with our negotiating team, for a new treaty, and in order to assure that our defense requirements, as best I could assess them, now and in the future, were adequately and sufficiently taken care of. I can assure you that this is how I come down on this issue." (SFRH Hearings, 27 Sep 77, Page 156, in response to a question from Senator Clark)

LATIN RELATIONS

Matthew B. Ridgway, general, U.S. Army (ret), former chief of Latin American Section of the War Plans Division of the Army General's Staff; former Chief of the Inter-American Defense Board; and former Commander-in-Chief, Caribbean: "A major obstacle to ratification today has been, in my opinion, failure to recognize and to evaluate the importance of our Latin American relations, particularly now that there is practically unanimous support by the governments of the other 20 republics for the position of Panama. The restoration of our Latin American relations to a level approaching that achieved and maintained through World War II and the decade immediately following, is a major, if not vital U.S. strategic interest."

Adm. James L. Holloway, III, USN, Chief of Naval Operations: "... our adherence to these Treaties, which make the Panamanians our direct partners in the defense of the Canal, will substantially contribute to a friendly and cooperative attitude among all Latin Americans toward the United States on the Panama Canal issue. This favorable effect, which I believe the Treaties will have on the attitudes of the Panamanians and Central Americans toward our continued use of the Canal as an essential link between our Atlantic and Pacific sea lines of communication will, in my opinion, substantially assist the United States to defend the Canal against the internal threat." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 24 Jan 78)

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, USA (ret), former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "When asked why I support the Panama Canal Treaties, my reply is that they offer the best prospect for assuring the efficient and unimpeded operation of the Canal and the improvement of Latin American relations in the very difficult period ahead." (Opening Statement before the SASC, 31 Jan 78)

TREATY REJECTION

Gen. Maxwell Taylor, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: “* * * let us hope we do not give the Kremlin chiefs the occasion to rejoice, which our rejection of these treaties would undoubtedly afford.”

Gen. W. C. Westmoreland, USA (ret), former Chief of Staff, U.S. Army: “In my opinion, the treaties in combination are not optimum since they are excessively generous and entail some risks. Nevertheless I recommend their ratification by the U.S. Senate since our basic interests seem to be protected and the costs and risks are small relative to the immediate and potential liabilities that would probably emerge if the treaty is rejected.

“My judgement follows an initial skepticism, and is derived from a careful analysis of the overall matter.” (Letter to the President, dated 23 Sep 77)

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, USA, former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: “* * * Senate ratification of these treaties will avoid the serious consequences of rejection after 14 years of patient discussion and negotiations with Panama—indeed most of the Third World—would view rejection as a breach of faith and as evidence of residual colonial bias in the United States. As a repudiation of the President, his negotiations, and his principal military advisors, the Joint Chiefs of Staff it, it would raise serious doubt as to the ability of the President to speak for the country and the worth of future agreements reached with his representative. Moscow would hail it as further evidence of American disunity and domestic weakness and as an invitation to press us harder in future tests of will and strength.” (Opening Statement before the SASC, 31 Jan 78)

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES, EX. N, 95-1

AMENDMENT NO. 42

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. Hatch submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, Ex. N, 95-1.

AMENDMENT NO. 43

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. Bartlett submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, Ex. N, 95-1.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, with respect to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, no provision is more important than the one simple, but unfortunately, very vague, sentence which constitutes article IV and which is the fundamental source of all rights the United States retains to defend the Panama Canal after the year 1999. That article reads as follows:

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties.

By now, every Member of the Senate is aware of the ambiguities inherent in this language and all are aware of the disputed interpretations which exist among the Members of this body, among officials of the Governments of Panama and the United States, and possibly, between the Governments of Panama and the United States.

Key issues to be resolved include:

Does the United States have the right to determine on its own, without necessarily obtaining the agreement of the Government of Panama, when and how the United States should act to protect the neutrality of the Panama Canal?

Does the United States have the right to enter Panamanian territory and waters to protect the canal?

Does the United States have the right to protect the neutrality of the canal against actions taken by the Government of Panama which infringe upon the neutrality of the canal?

In protecting the neutrality of the canal, what limits exist upon measures which could be taken by the United States to protect the neutrality of the canal?

These are fundamental issues which remain unresolved after extensive hearings by the Senate Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations. The inadequacy of the language existing in the treaty is made clear by the fact that over three-fourths of the Members of this body have agreed to cosponsor the amendment (No. 20) which would add the October 14, 1977, joint statement by President Carter and General Torrijos to the article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, in an effort to provide greater clarification to those provisions. I am myself a cosponsor of this amendment which reads as follows:

At the end of Article IV, insert the following:

"A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

Unfortunately, the language in the joint statement does not satisfactorily address the questions I have raised above. Where does it make clear the right of the United States to act without the invitation of the Government of Panama? Where does it make clear the right of the United States to conduct military operations on the territory and waters of Panama to protect the canal? Where does it provide for action by the United States to protect the canal's neutrality against infringements by the Government of Panama?

The American Law Division of the Library of Congress underscored this problem when it concluded:

[The Carter-Torrijos statement, while guaranteeing each party the right to act against threats directed at the Canal, also specifies that the U.S. may not intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. It is not altogether clear that the statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action.

These doubts are reinforced by statements such as that made by General Torrijos on the 20th of October 1977, in which he said:

[It is necessary for the United States to be committed so that when we ring the bell here, when we push the button, a bell rings over there, and the United States comes in defense of the Panama Canal. * * *

I repeat, we push the button, the bell rings, and the United States is obligated to come to our defense.

The continued existence after the October 14 Joint Statement, of confusing and divergent interpretations of the provisions of article IV by citizens, public and private, in Panama and the United States, underlines the fundamental inadequacy of the language which already exists in that article. Clearly, the addition of the language of the Joint Statement as provided by amendment No. 20 makes some fundamental changes in the treaty, changes which I believe will require that the Neutrality Treaty be resubmitted by the Government of Panama to the people of Panama in accordance with article 274 of their Constitution. But these changes alone are not sufficient to justify consent to ratification of the Neutrality Treaty if it retains the language now in article IV. It is that language which must be changed.

Fortunately for the Members of the Senate, language exists which would correct the weaknesses now in article IV—language which is consistent with the joint statement of October. This is the language which was revealed in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee by the Honorable William P. Clements, Jr., former Deputy Secretary of Defense. Mr. Clements was intimately involved in determining our Panama Canal negotiating policy and would have been a supporter of these treaties had he not discovered that key provisions of article IV had been changed during negotiations. The original language read:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the Canal, the Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for the neutrality and security of the Canal through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each Party shall take such other diplomatic, economic or military measures as such Party deems necessary in accordance with its constitutional processes.

Mr. President, I send to the desk for printing an amendment which would substitute this language for article IV as it now exists. The advantage of this language is that it answers the questions that I have raised without undermining the position of the United States or the Government of Panama and is, I believe, consistent with and compatible with the joint statement of October 14, 1977, issued by President Carter and General Torrijos. It also has the advantage of having been approved, according to Secretary Clements, by representatives of the Government of Panama and the United States. This amendment is consistent with the highest objectives of this treaty and will prevent dangerous and painful confusion and confrontation with the Government of Panama in the future.

RESERVATIONS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—EX. N, 95-1

RESERVATION NO. 3

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. Bartlett submitted an understanding to be proposed by him to the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty, Executive N, 95-1.

RESERVATION NO. 4

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. Bartlett submitted an understanding to be proposed by him to the resolution of ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, Executive N, 95-1.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, for some time, the Senate has been involved in extended debate over the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. The length of the debate reflects not only the importance of the Panama Canal to the United States, Panama, and the world, but also concern over divergent interpretations of its provisions. Clearly, there is major dissatisfaction in the Senate with the treaties as they were negotiated. The Senate will inevitably make changes and add reservations to these treaties in order to secure the neutral and efficient operation of the Panama Canal and to maximize the possibility of good relations with Panama and the world.

Over three-fourths of the Members of the Senate have joined with the majority and minority leaders in support of two amendments to the Treaty of Neutrality. Given the testimony received by the Armed Services Committee concerning ambiguous and inadequate economic provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty, it is likely that both treaties will contain altered language prior to the Senate's consent to ratification. Although the process of making these changes is consistent with American constitutional procedures, the resulting treaty documents will be different from the documents recently subjected to approval by a plebiscite of the people of Panama.

I would remind my colleagues in the Senate that the fate of the Panama Canal is as important to the people of Panama as it is to the people of the United States. For that reason, article 274 of the Constitution of Panama provides very specifically for exceptionally careful ratification procedures for any treaty dealing with the Panama Canal. Article 274 reads as follows:

Treaties which may be signed by the Executive Organ with respect to the Panama Canal, its adjacent zone, and the protection of the said Canal, and for the construction of a new Canal at sea level or of a third set of locks, shall be submitted to a national plebiscite.

Many Panamanians have expressed their view that the original 1903 Panama Canal Treaty was negotiated in a less-than-straight-forward manner, and this unusually specific provision for ratification of treaties dealing with the Panama Canal was undoubtedly designed to allay fears that a new treaty might also be negotiated in a cloud of confusion. This is not an unreasonable fear.

Mr. President, the citizens of Panama, like the citizens of the United States, are aware that a treaty is an agreement which is, in many ways, like a business contract. They understand that each side puts forth offers which are either accepted or rejected by the other side. The agreement is consummated when both parties agree to the same terms and express that agreement in language acceptable to both. Essentially, the same procedure applies to treaties.

By altering the treaty language as originally negotiated and as approved in Panama by plebiscite, the Senate is, in effect, rejecting an offer from Panama while at the same time countering with an offer of its own. Were the Government of Panama not to resubmit the treaties as amended to a plebiscite of the people of Panama, its action would seemingly constitute a rejection of the new offer from the United States.

Clearly, to give the proposed Panama Canal Treaties their maximum legitimacy, they must be submitted along with all changes to the people of Panama in accordance with article 274 of the Panamanian Constitution of 1972. Failure to take this step would leave the treaties vulnerable to refutation by subsequent governments of Panama, or for that matter the United States, and might reduce the binding effects of the treaties under international law. In my opinion, such a loophole could work to the advantage of Panama in the future.

Although the Government of Panama is undoubtedly a dictatorship, the rule of law has not completely ceased in Panama. Article 274 of their constitution clearly requires a plebiscite prior to ratification of any treaty dealing with the Panama Canal and the present Government of Panama has already acted once in accordance with that provision. Certainly, when confronted with a changed document, the right of the present Government to rule would be seriously called into question if the new language were not submitted to a plebescite.

I believe that the seriousness of this issue can be illustrated by two questions. Do you believe that Panama would accept a treaty that had not been ratified by the U.S. Senate in accordance with our Constitution, when such ratification is required by the language of the treaty itself? And would you, as an elected representative of the American people, give your consent to ratification of a treaty whose language had been changed subsequent to first consideration of the document? I think that the answer to both of those questions is no.

It would be a crime and an injustice to the people of the United States if the Senate were to ignore its treaty responsibilities, and it would be an injustice to the people of Panama, about whose human rights and democracy we have been greatly concerned, not to expect that the treaties as amended would be resubmitted to a plebescite of the people of Panama.

Mr. President, in order to strengthen respect for international law and the constitutional procedures of Panama and the United States, I am sending to the desk one reservation to the Panama Canal Treaty and one reservation to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the reservations were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

RESERVATION No. 3

Before the period at the end of the resolution of ratification, insert a comma and the following: "subject to the reservation that before the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification the President shall have determined that the Republic of Panama has ratified the Treaty, as amended, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the process required by the provisions of Article 274 of the Constitution of the Republic of Panama".

RESERVATION No. 4

Before the period at the end of the resolution of ratification, insert a comma and the following: "subject to the reservation that before the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification the President shall have determined that the Republic of Panama has ratified the Treaty, as amended, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the process required by the provisions of Article 274 of the Constitution of the Republic of Panama".

PANAMANIAN POLICE UNDER PROPOSED PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, the State Department recently responded to some questions which have arisen regarding the authority of United States and Panamanian police under the proposed Panama Canal Treaty.

The State Department's letter brings out a number of important points and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., February 8, 1978.

Hon. CLIFFORD P. CASE,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CASE: We understand that you have requested further information concerning certain aspects of the police authority of the United States under the proposed Panama Canal Treaty.

Under the new Treaty and its related implementing agreements, Panama would assume general police responsibility in the former Canal Zone, but the U.S. would retain significant enforcement responsibility.

For the duration of the Treaty, the U.S. military forces will control access to and exercise police functions within all U.S. defense sites. They would have full power to arrest persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States who are suspected of violating U.S. law. Moreover, they would be empowered to detain persons not subject to U.S. jurisdiction who are suspected of committing offenses against applicable laws or regulations, pending their formal arrest. Formal arrests of such persons would be made by Panamanian police authorities, and it is contemplated that Panamanian police liaison officers will be assigned to the U.S. military police headquarters on defense sites to facilitate such cooperation. A similar system will apply within military areas of coordination, although in these areas joint U.S.-Panamanian police patrols will in general be used, which will further facilitate the prompt, formal arrest of suspected offenders. Such joint patrols may also be utilized in other areas by mutual agreement.

Within the Canal operating areas, housing areas, and the Ports of Balboa and Cristobal, the U.S. will retain police authority for a period of 30 months from the entry into force of the Treaty. Joint patrols will be utilized in these areas, and a system of detention and arrest similar to that applicable on military areas of coordination will obtain.

After the 30-month period, Panama will assume police functions in these areas, but the U.S. will retain authority to use armed watchmen to guard all important installations related to the management, operation and maintenance of the Canal. These watchmen will have authority to detain suspects pending their formal arrest by the Panamanian police. It should be noted that all installations owned or used by United States Government agencies, including the Panama Canal Commission, will be inviolable, and therefore Panama's police may not function within them without the consent of the United States authorities.

We understand that you have also inquired concerning the procedures for apprehending persons present in Panama who have been indicted in U.S. courts for serious crimes against U.S. law. Under the present treaty arrangements, such persons found in the Canal Zone may be apprehended by the U.S. authorities; the Canal Zone is treated as an organized territory under U.S. law for purposes of extradition to United States State courts. Such persons found in Panama are subject to arrest and extradition by the Panamanian authorities pursuant to the United States-Panama Extradition Treaty of May 25, 1904. Under the new Treaty, U.S. general jurisdiction over the Canal Zone would terminate, but the treaty procedures for extradition now applicable in the rest of Panama would continue to apply throughout that country.

I hope the foregoing information will be of use to you. We would be pleased to provide any further information you may desire.

Sincerely,

HERBERT J. HANSELL,
Legal Adviser.

THE PANAMA BUG-OUT

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, every day we hear more opinions from more people about the Panama Canal. Most of these come from people who regard themselves as experts but who have never seen the canal nor read the proposed treaties which would give it away at a huge cost to the American taxpayer. I suggest that what is important is what the treaties say rather than what self-styled experts say about them. Recently Mr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones wrote a highly edifying article for the Los Angeles Times syndicate concerning the content of the treaties. He says that what they say is "outrageous in terms of the security and dignity of the United States and justice to American taxpayers."

Mr. Jones urges his readers and all Americans to get copies of the treaties and read them with a view to finding out exactly what they say. I endorse Mr. Jones' recommendation wholeheartedly. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Jones' article entitled "The Panama Bug-Out" be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE PANAMA BUG-OUT

(By Jenkin Lloyd Jones)

Among the millions of Americans who have expressed opinions pro and con concerning the proposed cession of the Panama Canal, it's a safe bet that not one percent have read it.

The basic issue is not what somebody says about the treaty but what the treaty says.

And (if I may tip my hand this early) what the treaty says is outrageous in terms of the security and dignity of the United States and justice to American taxpayers. Read it.

The gist of the document is that the Americans must pay the Panamanians heavy indemnity for having had the effrontery to build the canal in the first place.

We would turn over to Panama free of charge a facility that had cost in 1904-1914 $993 million with a present unrecovered investment of $750 million. The canal could not be presently duplicated for $2 billion, in spite of vastly improved earth-moving techniques.

In addition, Panama would take over the Zone, with all the improvements thrown in.

Between the time the treaty would be ratified and its expiration date at the end of 1999, the canal would be run by an American-controlled commission. The commission would owe the Panamanians:

1—$10 million a year for police and fire protection, street maintenance, etc. (Article 3, Section 5). This would escalate, according to inflation.

2—Thirty cents per ton of freight transiting the canal. (Art. 13, Sec. 4a). Currently, about 120 million tons are passing through each year. That would net the Panamanians $36 million. Again, this 30-cents figure would increase if the index of prices of U.S. manufactured goods should rise.

3—A fixed annuity of $10 million. (Art. 13, Sec. 4b).

4—An additional payment of up to $10 million annually out of canal profits. (Art. 13, Sec. 4c). If the profits didn't amount to $10 million, the shortfall would be charged against future surpluses.

Outside the treaty, the U.S. government has also agreed to hand Panama loans, grants and credits amounting to about $300 million in the next five years.

The United States would have the right to defend the canal for the next 22 years only. But how much defense, even in that short time?

In the amazing sub-treaty on the permanent neutrality of the canal it is provided (Art. 2) that in time of war the canal may be peacefully transited by vessels of all nations. Art. 3, Sec. 1e says specifically that "vessels of war of all nations shall at all times be entitled to transit the canal."

This means, in the event of war between America and Russia, for example, that even between now and 1999 while the United States would retain the theoretical right to defend the canal, we couldn't prevent the passage of Russian ships and submarines as long as they went through peacefully.

Article 5 reads in its entirety: "After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory."

The idea that this gigantic and specifically worded giveaway of America's most strategic strong point can be cured by clarifying memoranda between Panama strong man Omar Torrijos and President Carter overwhelms credulity. What would the next Panama strong man say?

Now, about the poor Panamanians. Our chief negotiators, Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker and Sol Linowitz, seemed as guilt-ridden over the injury we had allegedly done to the Panamanians as they were casual about American money.

What is the fact?

Among the 21 nations between the Rio Grande and the southern tip of South America, Panama's per capita income of $1,147 (1975) was exceeded by only two—Argentina and Venezuela. It was more than double that of the average for the five other Central American republics.

How can one account for this except by the existence of the canal? We built the canal. Do we owe hundreds of millions in conscience money for doing it?

In his recent State of the Union message, President Carter said that America's cession of the canal would greatly strengthen our nation by cooling a point of irritation with our Latin neighbors.

If the President thinks that the cries of "Yanqui imperialism" will be muted when we surrender the canal he is as naive as those college presidents, during the wild '60s, who kept backing up before the SDS in an effort to find peace. Damning Yankee imperialism is an absolute necessity in Latin politics, and the more fouled-up and corrupt the politician the more he needs it.

If our collapse in Panama is going to be so good for America how does it happen that Havana, Moscow and every Communist-lining outfit in this country and abroad are demanding that we get out?

What we need to do is fire the striped pants and get a couple of riverboat poker players to renegotiate this sorry, sorry thing.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume the consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, which the clerk will report.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the neutrality treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on amendment No. 40 by the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen).

The Chair, with pleasure, recognizes the distinguished Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. Humphrey).

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—LAUNCHING AN ERA OF PARTNERSHIP

Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is not a small coincidence that my maiden speech as a U.S. Senator should be addressed to the issue of the new Panama Canal treaties. It is not because this emotion-charged issue just happens to be the business of the Senate at this particular time. I say this because my interest in Panama and Latin America dates back to 1961 when I traveled with Hubert on an extensive study mission to our neighbors in that region.

The dispute with Panama over modernizing our treaty relationship for the operation of the Panama Canal has been the United States longest running argument with our hemispheric neighbors. Even as my husband and I arrived in Panama 17 years ago, then Panamanian President Roberto Chiari was calling for new negotiations on the 1903 treaty. In fact, President Chiari formally advised President Kennedy, on September 11, 1961, of his government's desire to negotiate a new canal treaty. The festering concern over this issue was readily apparent in the body politics of Panama.

But basically, there was a spirit of optimism which Hubert and I sensed throughout our trip. It was a new era in United States-Latin American relationships. It was a time of the launching of the Alliance for Progress. It was a time, or at least the nations of Latin America believed it was the time, that the United States would truly enter into a more mature relationship with our traditional friends and allies. We were moving from a past which had been characterized by U.S. colonialism, interventionism and paternalism. We were moving into an era of equality among nations.

Yet, something happened during the course of these intervening 17 years. The Alliance for Progress lies in ruin. Our preoccupation with Vietnam, the Middle East, and superpower politics pushed Latin America and other regions of the developing world onto the back burner of our foreign policy considerations.

And that one symbol of the willingness of the United States to enter into a more mature relationship with our friends throughout Latin America—the Panama Canal—has become more than just a festering concern. It has reached crisis dimensions in our relations throughout Latin America.

Will the United States finally rise to the challenge? After 17 years, will our Latin American friends finally come to believe that they are coequal partners with the United States?

This is the essential question which is now before the U.S. Senate. The Panama Canal treaties symbolize the pivotal point in U.S. policy toward Latin America and the nations of the developing world.

I can recall my own deep concern and shock over the riots in Panama. Three U.S. soldiers and 21 Panamanians were killed in the 1964 riots. These riots presented President Lyndon Johnson with his first foreign policy crisis. And it became urgently clear that there was a need for a new basic agreement on the status of the Panama Canal. Yet, public and congressional pressure foredoomed prospects for ratification of any new agreement that might be negotiated with the Republic of Panama at that time.

In all too many national capitals of Latin America, the issue of the future status of the Panama Canal Zone has been raised to the level of an all or nothing confrontation with the United States. We are not being candid with ourselves or the American people if we do not face up to this reasoning. It should be readily apparent to us that the nations of Latin America have grown increasingly independent of the United States in the determination of their foreign policy positions. They are united in opposition to the United States continuing to exercise the role which it assumed in the Panama Canal Zone under the 1903 treaty.

Yet, we have to understand, and appreciate, the roots of this concern throughout Latin America. For these nations, the Panama Canal Zone, under the 1903 treaty, represents a vestige of a period of humiliating weakness and servitude in inter-American affairs. The Canal Zone is a violation of a deeply held Latin American concern for sovereignty and nonintervention that has long historical roots. Sensitivity over the sovereignty issue easily generates common cause with the Afro-Asian nations of the Third World who have confronted similar issues in their move away from European colonial domination.

We emerged from World War II, as the world's most powerful democracy. We were perceived as the champions of equality, decency, and human compassion. It was at our urging that the European powers began divesting themselves of their colonies in Asia and Africa. Yet, in the mid-1970's, when the last of the traditional colonial empires—that of Portugal—dissolved under nationalist and world pressures, the United States continued to maintain what commonly has been perceived as a colonial enclave in Panama. In essence, while we have been telling other industrialized powers that colonialism could no longer be tolerated in a diverse community of nations, we have until now refused to address that same charge of colonialism directed against our privileged status, as if sovereign, in the Panama Canal Zone.

Those who are opposed to the ratifications of the new Panama Canal treaties argue that we are engaged in a headlong retreat globally. This march backwards, they allege, began with Vietnam. It is continuing with Panama. They ask: Where do we draw the line? They contend that we cannot allow ourselves to be perceived as caving-in to a "little banana Republic."

True, the United States is a great and powerful nation. But let us be mindful of the fact that our greatness depends as much on our tradition of dedication to justice and fairness, the Founding Fathers' ideals and dreams of liberty, and our healthy political and economic base at home, as upon military power.

A great power which aspires to be an arbiter of stability and orderly change accepts certain responsibilities. In this economically and politically interdependent world of today, we must insure that our friends derive enough out of their relationship with us that they remain our friends. If a great power does not take care to keep its friends, it will inevitably stand alone against its enemies.

We are a world power. But do we have to prove it by flexing our muscles against little Panama? I think this would be the most preposterous position in which we could place ourselves.

We must also be honest with ourselves in evaluating who would benefit, should the Senate reject these treaties. The prime beneficiaries would be the Communist parties of Latin America. The Communists exploit this issue as being an example of "Yankee imperialism." They use the Panama Canal issue as concrete evidence that the United States never was, and never will be, a true and good neighbor.

In our preoccupation with the differences over the canal, Americans tend to overlook the many positive elements in our long association with Panama. The United States and Panama have been working together for 75 years now. There certainly is not another nation with which Panama maintains a closer relationship than the United States.

Although this relationship has centered on the canal, it has not been limited exclusively to this vital waterway. Important ties of trade and investment link our two countries. For 30 years we have been allies under a mutual defense treaty—the Rio Pact. And on a personal level, thousands of Panamanians have attended schools and universities in the United States. And Gen. Omar Torrijos is in charge of one of Latin America's most capitalist economies.

We have to admit that the Panamanians have been extremely patient. Would we have exhibited this same patience had we been forced to wait 75 years for change?

We justifiably are growing concerned over the decline of democracy globally, and in particular throughout the developing world. Yet, as the world's leading democracy, we often have not fulfilled the ideals of our Founding Fathers. The concepts of justice and equality should not stop at our Nations' shores. They should be reflected in our relationship with other countries. The only effective way to combat the tyranny of communism and the totalitarianism of the right is to battle for human and economic rights and democratic values. This concept is just as applicable to our relations with other nations, as it is to our concern for the individual in those nations.

The Panama Canal treaties offer the United States an opportunity to demonstrate that we have the capacity to meet changed international conditions constructively and to move ahead toward more cooperative and more mutually beneficial relations with the developing world.

One of the most relevant observations concerning these treaties was delivered by Bill Moyers on CBS Reports, which was aired November 1, 1977. Mr. Moyers stated:

As this debate continues, you wonder if the United States Senate will finally be voting on a pair of treaties or a symbol. For many people, the Panama issue has ceased to be the Canal itself. It is, instead, a choice between conflicting emotional beliefs about America's role in the world; rival views of American patriotism. The voices against ratification echo a time when the clearest act of patriotism was to oppose any change on the world scene that the Communists might exploit. Given a chance now to send a message of American resolve to a world that has steadily frustrated our national will, these people say no to the treaties. There are times when a great power whose ideal is freedom had to draw a line and say to hostile forces, this far and no further. What the Senate must consider is whether Panama is the place to draw it.

Americans who favor ratification of the treaties say it is not, that Panama is actually the place to show we can protect our self-interest best by helping a small country achieve its own nationalist dreams.

To be sure, you cannot listen to the Panamanians without believing that they have heard the voices of our own ancestors—those who wrote the Declaration of Independence, and helped to rid our country of foreign powers. Enough of them are determined to imitate us that the talk of a long war of independence if we don't leave gracefully becomes neither a bluff nor blackmail, but a lesson drawn straight from our own experience and from the Panamanian's own conviction of their national destiny. They have their patriots, too. The Canal is equally a symbol to them.

In the end, the Senate faces a pragmatic choice: whether the best way to keep the Canal open is through negotiation or confrontation. If the issue remains more than that, the Senate will also have to determine what price we're willing to pay for a symbol.

Mr. President, it has been 17 years since my trip to Panama, and 17 years is much too long a time for a great power and a great democracy to resist change, particularly when that change is in our vital national interest. It is time for us to move into the era of partnership and equality, and that is why I strongly support the Senate giving its advice and consent to ratification of these treaties.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mrs. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I rise to congratulate Senator Humphrey on the first speech that she has made to the Senate.

It is a speech that reflects judicious vision, realism, and compassion. She has briefly touched upon the history of the treaties and of our relations with our small neighbor to the south. She has rightly pointed to the fact that our policy toward the country of Panama with respect to the treaties is one that is being watched in other Latin American countries; and, as she has so accurately predicted, the outcome of what we do here in respect of these treaties will have a far-reaching impact on our relations not only, as she has pointed out, with all of the Latin American countries of this hemisphere, but also the developing Third World countries of Asia and Africa.

She has pointed to the canal treaty of 1903, as amended in 1938 and 1955, and to our presence in Panama, as a continuing yestige of colonialism—a concept of which we have been highly critical in other countries and on other continents. As she has stated, Latin American countries, particularly the country of Panama, have common cause with Asian and African third world nations.

As the Senator from Minnesota has said, we have spoken with a forked tongue. We have derided and castigated and criticized colonialism where it has existed in Asia and Africa, but we are reluctant to recognize the injustice that we would bring to bear upon the country of Panama were we to reject these treaties. We would be saying, as it were, "This is the voice of Esau," when actually, in that context, it would be the voice of Jacob with the hairy hand of Esau. We criticize colonialism elsewhere and hold onto it ourselves.

She has pointed accurately and decisively to the fact that a great nation has been done an injustice, not only within the confines of its own borders but in its dealings with other nations.

She has pointed to the impact that our decision here has upon this country's future.

I commend her also for pointing out, as has been pointed out before, that to reject these treaties would be to invite Communist exploitation of this issue in Panama, in other Latin American countries, and elsewhere.

I hope the American people will ponder upon that statement by the Senator from Minnesota. We must not act in a way that will encourage Communist exploitation of an issue against the United States of America.

Finally, she asks the rhetorical question, would we have exhibited the same patience the people of Panama have shown now for over a period of three-quarters of a century? Would we have exhibited the same patience?

Would the people of the State of Minnesota, would the people of the State of West Virginia, would the people of the State of Maryland, of Nevada, of Alabama have exhibited that same patience were a foreign power after 75 years still exercising its right to sovereignty to maintain a military presence over a strip of land and water 10 miles wide and 50 miles long across any one of these States I have named, or any of the other States of this great Nation?

So let us live and let live. Let us act in accordance with the admonition, advice, and counsel that have been given to the Senate today by the very distinguished Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. Humphrey). Again I commend her and salute her for her statements.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mrs. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the able, distinguished, gracious and charming Senator from Minnesota for her very fine, her very eloquent points, on this important issue. I am delighted that she has chosen this issue of the Senate advising and consent on the Panama Canal treaties for her maiden speech here on the Senate floor.

As she was speaking, I could not help but recall to mind her late, great, distinguished husband, our long-time colleague, the eloquent Senator from Minnesota, Hubert Humphrey, and how pleased and proud he would be if he could have known of the wonderful way that she is carrying on the fight that he would have carried on in the Senate Chamber on this very issue.

We had looked to Senator Hubert Humphrey for his advice, for his eloquence in discussing this issue, and we looked to him to be one of the leaders of the forces seeking ratification of the treaties, the approval by the Senate of the treaties.

I am very much pleased for having had the opportunity of being 3 or 4 feet away from the present Senator Humphrey as she delivered her maiden speech.

It so happens that we adopt different position in regard to this issue. That does not lessen in the least my admiration for her and for her statement of reasons for supporting the treaties.

I am certainly not able to refer to my other colleagues as I did the charming and gracious Senator from Minnesota because I do not know any of my other colleagues who would qualify for that expression. But certainly she is all that I have said about her.

I might say that I am reminded of Paul's appearance before King Agrippa. Paul had spoken so eloquently before King Agrippa in urging him to accept the presentation that he should follow the advice of Paul. King Agrippa said, "Almost thou persuadest me."

I will say to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, almost thou persuadest me on this issue. But not quite, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

Again, I commend the Senator for her very fine and most gracious remarks on this subject.

Mrs. HUMPHREY. I wish to thank the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished Senator from Alabama for their very kind words. I am especially appreciative of the words of our majority leader.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mrs. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I join with the other Senators in thanking Senator Humphrey for stating in a very lucid and thoughtful way a powerful case for supporting these treaties. I thought she brought to the discussion of this vital issue the same qualities of understanding, of thought, of concern, of vision that have always marked her approach to the serious problems which face this country. She has been in her own right a strong and powerful leader in this Nation to bring forth the best in the American character.

I join in thanking her for undertaking, as her maiden speech, to enter into this issue, which is so important to measuring up to the best that is in America; and in particular, to thank her for speaking so eloquently with vision, with a deep perception of a better future. By the nature of things, we have to engage in what one would call a worst-case analysis, as we seek to make our judgment with respect to approving these treaties. It is refreshing and very helpful, once in a while, for someone to come along and, in a very clear and strong voice, point out that these treaties offer a positive opportunity to this country; an opportunity to build a close and healthy partnership.

As the distinguished Senator from Minnesota pointed out, we have worked together with the Panamanian people over the years. Panamanians have come to this country by the droves to obtain their education. They look to the United States for economic cooperation, for political cooperation. And I, for one, thank the able Senator from Minnesota for speaking in this debate in terms of the opportunities these treaties offer to America, in terms of a vision of the relationship that can be developed between the people of the United States and the people of Panama, between our two countries. I know how sensitive the Senator from Minnesota has always been to these considerations.

Mr. President, I support her completely in her view that we have an opportunity to build a relationship which will be one of close partnership with the Panamanians; to build a relationship which we can hold up to the rest of the world as a classic example of how a superpower and a small country can work together to their own mutual benefit.

I again commend and thank the distinguished Senator from Minnesota for her extraordinarily fine statement.

Mrs. HUMPHREY. I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for his remarks. He made me feel very good.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield for a short statement from the Senator from Nevada?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. Mrs. Humphrey, may I join in commending you for an excellent statement? I have not been around here long enough not to remember how intimidating an experience for a new U.S. Senator it is on this floor. I thought you did marvelously well. You brought, once again, to this floor, a badly needed Humphrey presence.

I do not know of anybody on this floor whom I valued in terms of advice and counsel more than Senator Hubert Humphrey. We are of totally opposite philosophical persuasions, but the thing that struck me all the time was that he was a totally honest liberal, believing with complete conviction in what he felt was in the best interests of this country. It is good to have that presence once again with us.

Mrs. HUMPHREY. Thank you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Chafee).

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Chair. Mr. President, I also would like to join in the praise of the Senator from Minnesota for the excellent statement that she gave on this subject.

Mr. President, few issues have divided Members of the Senate and the American people to the extent that the proposed Panama Canal treaties have. As is true with many differences, this one transcends partisan and ideological lines. My own party, the Republican Party, has respected leaders on both sides of this issue and, of course, this is true of the Democratic Party as well. Rather than being based on partisan identity, it seems to me that the debate over the proposed Panama Canal treaties centers around a fundamental issue. That is, how we look at the world around us.

The building of the Panama Canal in the early days of this century was an enormous engineering feat. It stands as an extraordinary national accomplishment in that we conquered what seemed to be unconquerable. In addition to the tremendous engineering expertise that was required, the medical skill, and the sheer human determination on the part of those associated with the project, the successful completion of the Panama Canal was made possible by the bursting self-confidence of the American people.

The American people had a vision to look and to plan well into the future.

America, at the turn of the century, as you will recall, was a strong and confident nation and, in building the Panama Canal, we saw an opportunity to take a leadership role in a world in which we were hardly dominant. All Americans, all across this Nation, can indeed be proud of what our countrymen did in building and operating the path between the seas.

Just as the building of the Panama Canal demonstrated our world outlook at the beginning of this century, America's action on these proposed treaties will demonstrate how we see the world today. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the kind of American spirit that led to the building of the canal now moves us to approve these treaties.

The world is constantly changing; we all know that. It behooves a great nation such as ours not only to keep pace, but to be a leader in setting the direction for our changing world. I do not think we should be immobilized by fear that things in the future will be different than they were in the past. We should be confident that this country of ours can adapt her role as needed to assert a strong leadership position in the future. The winds of change have swept away colonialism. Now these winds of change move us to reassess our relationship with Panama. The time has come for the United States to achieve a new arrangement with Panama, a new arrangement that will provide for the protection and the respect of the interests of both countries.

To understand present circumstances, it is important that we briefly highlight a few significant historical facts. These have been touched on by prior speakers, but they do seem to me to be extremely important in deciding where we go now.

It would be an understatement to say that the 1903 treaty was slanted in favor of the United States. And, of course, the very man who negotiated that treaty, Secretary of State John Hay, writing in 1903 to Senator Spooner, said:

The new treaty was very satisfactory, vastly advantageous to the United States and, we must confess with what face we can muster, not so advantageous to Panama. You and I know too well how many points there are in this treaty to which a Panamanian patriot could object.

Now, lopsided as it was in favor of the United States, the 1903 treaty did not convey sovereignty over the zone to the United States. We obtained the right to act as if sovereign, but actual sovereignty has resided in Panama. I do not think that it has been pointed out yet that in the 1936 United States-Panama Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation, which we negotiated with Panama, we referred to the Canal Zone as "territory of the Republic of Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States."

The issue of the Americanized Canal Zone, complete with an American Governor there, cutting Panama in two, has been a particular sore point ever since the 1903 treaty was enacted. Recently, I had the pleasure, as so many other Senators did, of being in Panama. There, one could not help but be struck by the depth of the feeling of the Panamanian people regarding this issue. I must say there is no single issue that unites the people of Panama more than the irritation that their nation is divided by a foreign power. I am sure that we, too, would be resentful if there were a 10-mile wide strip, occupied by a foreign power, cutting through our State—Rhode Island, Nevada, Alabama, wherever it might be—or cutting our country in half. Every Member of this body would be rightfully outraged at such an affront.

Now, why concluding these treaties with Panama is the right thing to do goes far beyond the fact that these treaties pass muster simply on the basis of being in the best interests of the United States. The principle American interest in the canal is to insure that the canal remains open, efficient, and secure. The other issues are subordinate to that principle objective.

These treaties assure that goal, and this is the significant point, it seems to me, because the Panamanians become partners in this arrangement with a substantial stake in the success of the canal. It is in their self-interest.

While the United States will have the primary responsibility to operate and defend the canal for the next 23 years, the Panamanians each year will assume greater responsibility in achieving these objectives.

There is no question but there has to be the closest cooperation between the United States and Panama during this period.

Everything is not perfect in these arrangements, and I must say that I think it behooves the United States and the Panamanians to proceed immediately with this increased cooperation.

During the recent trip, which I mentioned we had to Panama with Senators Garn, and Baker, we were astonished when we met with Gov. Harold Parfitt of the zone and asked him how his relationships were with General Torrijos. He replied that he never met General Torrijos, even though he had been there as Governor for some 7 or 5 years.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. Is that not rather troublesome?

Mr. CHAFEE. That was troublesome, and it seems to me we have to understand the arrangements that exist there now and immediately take the steps necessary to insure this cooperation between the Governor and General Torrijos.

Mr. LAXALT. Many of us are troubled by the fact that we do not think that by consenting to these treaties we are going to be dealing with a credible partner. It has nothing to do with the Panamanians.

Many of us feel we are dealing with a dictator and, apparently, that is the case.

I had the same information, and I was there myself, that the general has maintained at least a hands off posture with our own representatives in the zone. How well does that speak in these coming 23 years as a foundation upon which to base a workable agreement?

Mr. CHAFEE. The very next day after we met with Governor Parfitt, we met with General Torrijos, and we raised precisely this point. "Why, General, have you personally not met with Governor Parfitt?"

The answer was:

My people have met with his people, firemen have met with the firemen, the police chiefs with the police chiefs in the zone. There is that level of cooperation.

But here, it seemed to me, was the most significant point, significant to those who constantly say that General Torrijos is a dictator, and in a dictator the term implies he is above all, he is supreme.

Mr. LAXALT. Does the Senator have any doubts about that?

Mr. CHAFEE. If the Senator will just listen to this next point, that he is supreme and he can act regardless of the feelings of the people not at all.

We asked General Torrijos, "Why don't you meet with Governor Parfitt?"

General Torrijos' reply was, and that was substantiated by the views of others:

It would be impossible for me to have my picture taken with Governor Parfitt because the people of Panama would say I had sold out, I have given way to the Yankees.

So, therefore, while we can have this cooperation at the present time on the lower level, until the treaties are approved, until we have a definite arrangement, he has to keep an arms' length distance or his people will react in the very manner I pointed out earlier, demonstrating their feelings of outrage over this zone that goes right through the middle of their country.

So it seems to me that we have got a lot to do when we enact the treaties, as the Senator knows, then during the next 23 years about everything remains the same except the zone is abolished and the Panamanians take over the responsibility for the fire, the police, the general maintenance in the area of what we now call the zone.

Furthermore, the Panamanians will take an increasing responsibility in the operation and the maintenance of the canal. However, the full responsibility, the major part of the responsibility, the 5-to-4 vote on the commission, remains with the Americans as they ever bring in the Panamanians to positions of increased responsibility in the zone regarding the canal.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. I value the Senator's observations in this regard, because he is a former Governor. Of course, he was Secretary of the Navy. I know that he must share with many of us great concern about where we are securitywise.

It is true, is it not, that during this 23-year period, in addition to gradually moving away in the so-called civil functions toward the Panamanian people, we will also drastically reduce our defense establishment in the zone?

Mr. CHAFEE. Not required.

As a matter of fact, we talked with the American general, General McAuliffe, who is in charge, the senior American military officer in the zone.

The reduction in the size of our bases from what they are now is minimal and of no concern to him. I mean, it does not reduce his military effectiveness whatsoever.

Mr. LAXALT. Well, is it not true that during the course of this 23-year period that the present 14 establishments we have are going to be reduced to three or four.

Mr. CHAFEE. What we define as an establishment is open to debate, as the Senator knows. A little small encampment, is that an establishment or is it not?

Mr. LAXALT. I am talking about in terms of fixed bases within the Canal Zone.

It has been our understanding during the course of the debate, and Senator Allen perhaps could shed some light on this, that one of the troublesome features of this treaty is that during this next 23-year period our military presence is going to be drastically reduced and in the year 2000 it is gone. We will have no military presence there.

That, of course, is the thrust of the Allen amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. That certainly is true. Immediately, we will reduce our bases from 14 down to 4.

Also, it is provided in the signed agreements, which I pointed out are three times as voluminous as the treaties, that every 2 years the two governments have a right to review this defense status and, conceivably, we could be completely out of there in 2 more years under this signed agreement that we are not able to reach by amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind Senators that the Senator from Rhode Island has control of the floor and has to agree to yielding to the Senators.

Mr. CHAFEE. I am always glad to yield for the observations of my distinguished colleagues.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. If the Senator from Alabama has further points to make, I would be glad to yield, and the same goes for the Senator from Nevada.

But I would like to touch on a point the Senator from Alabama raised. I quote now the testimony of Lieutenant General McAuliffe, who, as we know, is our senior military commander on the spot, and this is his testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee:

On several occasions, as an example, I have seen and heard statements to the effect that there are now 14 U.S. bases in the Zone, but that there will be only four left under the 1977 treaties. I know of no good foundation for either one of those figures—neither is correct. By actual count, there are 22 identifiable U.S. military reservations in the Canal Zone, most of them in active use, some inactive. However, they are administratively grouped in the Code of Federal Regulations into four; one per military service and one for my joint headquarters.

In my judgment, the number of bases is far less important than their adequacy to support our forces and missions. I invite your attention to the first map on which is indicated the extent of the military reservations in the Canal Zone today. To compare it to the base areas provided under the 1977 treaty agreements, I refer you to the second map on which (again in red), is indicated the extent of the defense sites available to the U.S. forces until the year 2000. One can see from the two maps that the size of the base areas in red would be somewhat reduced under the new treaties.

As Senators will recall, I mentioned that. General McAuliffe said:

As the military commander, I can assure you that the reduction is not significant in terms of supporting U.S. forces and our mission accomplishment.

It seems to me that that is the word from the man who is in charge.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield.

Mr. LAXALT. Was he not making these observations to indicate also complete military capability to defend the canal without having to send in additional forces?

Mr. CHAFEE. I would have to refer later to his testimony, to see if that is true.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not know if that is the context of the testimony.

I do know that General McAuliffe, in interviews with the Washington Star and the Miami Herald in May of last year, indicated, in opposition to the statement that we needed 50,000 or 100,000 additional troops to defend the canal, that with our present forces there we could adequately protect it and defend it. I wonder if the comments the Senator from Rhode Island attributed to him during the hearing were not directed to that particular point.

Mr. CHAFEE. I believe not. What he was doing here was referring to the areas available for defense purposes.

This keeps coming up. The distinguished Senator from Alabama discussed the number of bases, and I believe the Senator from Nevada mentioned it in his remarks here today: Is it 22, is it 14?

However, I believe the important point is the one that General McAuliffe makes. He concludes:

In my judgment, the number of bases is far less important than their adequacy to support our forces and missions * * * I can assure you that the reduction is not significant in terms of supporting U.S. forces and our mission accomplishment.

He also mentions, as I mentioned earlier, that between now and the year 2000, the reductions in our military bases there will not be significant. I have difficulty understanding why it constantly comes up that that is not so. Here we have the comments of the man in charge, which I think is the only source we can turn to.

I do not think that those who have seen it can come away without being impressed by the mammoth ongoing dredging effort that is required, which has removed 1½ times as much dirt from the canal as was removed in the original construction.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield.

Mr. LAXALT. If the Senator would prefer, I will defer questioning until the conclusion of his statement. However, I think it makes more sense to discuss these points as they are raised, if that is all right.

Mr. CHAFEE. Fine.

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator from Rhode Island has raised the point of maintenance. I think our colleagues should know and the American people should know that for this year the maintenance budget—and I will stand corrected by the Senator—is $65 million, is it not?

Mr. CHAFEE. No. That maintenance budget, as it was explained to us by Governor Parfitt, applies to all the activities conducted within the zone. By that we mean schools, housing, fire departments, police stations, the Governor's residence, and all that. It does not apply to the maintenance for the canal itself.

Mr. LAXALT. It was our recollection—and I will stand corrected on this—that this was devoted purely and simply to maintenance of the canal facilities per se. Does the Senator have the figure as to the canal?

Mr. CHAFEE. I will try to get that. Perhaps we can set that point aside, if the Senator wishes to bring up another one.

Mr. LAXALT. The other day, Senator Garn spoke on the floor. He traveled with the Senator from Rhode Island on this trip. In the debate on the floor, he expressed strong reservations, as a former executive—as is the Senator from Rhode Island—about pressures being brought to bear on General Torrijos or whoever is going to be in charge of the canal government, to properly take the money and set it aside for maintenance of this facility, in view of the pressures that will be brought to bear to use it for social and other causes. Does the Senator from Rhode Island share that?

Mr. CHAFEE. As the Senator from Nevada knows, as the former Governor of a State, setting aside money for maintenance, particularly preventive maintenance, is one of the most difficult things a Governor or any other executive has to do, because the money is there and it is up for grabs. Let us postpone that new boiler for another year. We do not want more trucks. We will get them next year.

There is always this thrust to take money and use it now for schools or health or whatever it might be. There is no question that that temptation exists, and that pressure will be on any executive who is running the canal. There is no question about that.

Mr. LAXALT. That presents a rather serious problem in connection with eventually handing over a facility of this size to the Panamanian Government, in all fairness, does it not?

Mr. CHAFEE. It presents the kind of concern that caused me to raise it with the Panamanians. I pointed out to them that this canal is dependent upon not just operation, because once operation stops and the ships do not go through, everybody objects. There is also this preventive maintenance question that the Senator raises. That is why I was particularly interested in getting to know personally the top people in the Panamanian Government. As I am sure the Senator from Nevada noted when he was there, the top officials in the Panamanian Government are not military leaders. They are extremely well educated, extremely well motivated, intelligent, competent civilians. I was impressed by their realization of this and their dedication to the principle that this canal has to be maintained if they are going to get the revenue from it that they are looking forward to in the future.

Mr. LAXALT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island think that under the existing provisions of the treaties there would be adequate safeguards built in so that money is set aside, so that we do not have to worry about maintenance of this facility, or is it left wholly to the whim of the Panamanian Government?

Mr. CHAFEE. I would quarrel with the Senator's phraseology.

Mr. LAXALT. Only to the discretion, then, if that is a more sensitive word.

Mr. CHAFEE. I think the canal is left, come the year 2000, to the Panamanians. We have to have some confidence in them, as we always have to have confidence in any kind of dealing, in their national pride, their sense of self-interest. After all, this canal is not the only way to transport goods between the seas, as we know.

There are alternate ways. If this canal is not kept in operational and proper maintenance, then shippers will use alternate methods.

Mr. LAXALT. Is the Senator not a little concerned about the fiscal track record of the present regime in Panama, regardless of their good intentions? And I do not challenge that. Is it not a fact that they have gone from a public debt of around $187 million 10 years ago to a $2 billion level presently? It is eating up deferral of debt service, some 39 percent of their gross national product. Does it not concern the Senator that these people, well intentioned though they might be, do not have the financial and fiscal know-how to administer the type of facility?

Mr. CHAFEE. It is a little hard for us, who are currently running a $60 billion debt, and perhaps more next year, to lecture other countries on fiscal responsibility.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not intend to do that. We do a lot of it around here, too. I think that perhaps one of the problems in the situation is that they have profited from our bad example and bad fiscal management.

Mr. CHAFEE. It would be my hope that the United States, Panama, and a few other countries in the world would pay more attention to fiscal responsibility.

But back to the maintenance that we were touching on before, as the Senator from Nevada knows, being a former distinguished Governor, this maintenance problem is a constant difficulty. But I think in the canal situation there is one point that perhaps makes it different than the experiences we had in our own States where we could defer this or that, defer new painting at the institutions, defer the maintenance of our heating systems. There if we failed the results were not so severe. But in the canal I think everybody appreciates that failure to do the proper dredging, failure to do the proper detection of potential landslides can result in such mammoth results that it would be catastrophic. A landslide coming into the canal is incredibly expensive to remove, and I think those who have been associated with the canal, including the Panamanians, are cognizant of this. So this alone I believe will create a great incentive for them to keep that canal in top condition.

I would refer once again to the capabilities of the civilian ministers of the government which I believe the Senator was impressed with, as was I. We can only also mention that many of them received their education in the United States. This does not make them perfect, but at least it makes them think in the same terms as many Americans do.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. I certainly will.

Mr. SARBANES. I think the point the Senator made with respect to the Panamanians is a very important point. One of the things these treaties do is give the Panamanians a very strong interest in an open, efficient canal that will maximize its business and, in fact, the payments to Panama will be geared to the amount of traffic that moves through the canal; therefore, there is a very strong incentive to maximize the amount of traffic that moves through the canal by operating an efficient canal.

It is clear that for the next 22 years the decision on the maintenance budget of the Panama Canal will be made by the Panama Canal Commission Board of nine members, all nine of them appointed by the United States, five of them Americans and four Panamanians, but all nine appointed by the United States.

I think the point the Senator makes that the Panamanians do have, and will have, even more, a strong interest in a viable canal is a very good one. They have a direct interest in making this canal work, and there is no reason in the world to think that they will not want to do that; in fact, there is every reason to believe that they will want, in the most compelling way, to make the canal work well. They would only be hurting themselves if they, in fact, did not do that.

It does not take a particularly unique perception of self-interest to see that a strong viable canal serves their purposes as well as everybody else's purposes.

Mr. CHAFEE. I think the point the Senator makes is an extraordinarily good one. It would seem to me that those who are so dedicated to the free enterprise system, such as the distinguished Senator from Nevada, would realize that there is nothing stronger to create an incentive to keep something going successfully than a self-interest. The Panamanians will get a significant amount of their prospective budget in the future from the successful operation of the canal. No canal; no income. And so what greater incentive could we give any country than that?

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. CHAFEE. I certainly will.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not for the moment attempt to minimize the importance of motivation and incentive, and it is here. But we have thousands of businesses all around this country that go broke every year with people who have all kinds of incentive and motivation but lack one important ingredient in making a business work, and that is know-how. That is the concern the Senator from Nevada has, because the track record from the last 10 years down there of this particular government in business enterprises has not been too good.

I have information which indicates that these major projects started by Torrijos' government have failed financially: Three sugar mills, a hydroelectric project, a new airport, public transportation system, the Cantadora resort island, agricultural development programs, and exploration of natural resources.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. LAXALT. Let me conclude, if I may, to make a reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. CHAFEE. I think I have the time, and let us take them one at a time. I say to the Senator from Nevada I am interested in his views.

Mr. LAXALT. Without getting into details and without using a blanket indictment here I do not intend to do that. All I indicate is that there are serious questions on the part of this little government. We have 1,300,000 people in this small country. There are serious questions, irrespective of their motivation, irrespective of their initiative, in the area of financial know-how to operate and manage a gigantic facility. That is the reservation the Senator from Nevada has and I think it is shared by many of my colleagues.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me briefly?

Mr. CHAFEE. Why do we not hear from the Senator from Alaska and then the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GRAVEL. I have a brief observation. We are not talking about some high technology endeavor. We are talking about something that requires average manual dexterity and probably not too much more than that. You open and close the gates. I mean, we are not talking about moving into some space-age technology. You need somebody to stand at the switch and when somebody says "Ready open the gates" you let the water in, and then when somebody says "Ready" again you close the gates. This is preposterous. I have seen things in Panama on two trips that are considerably more sophisticated in the private sector than operating the Panama Canal will ever be. So, I would hope there would be no Member of the Senate who would come before this body and insult the intelligence of colleagues by trying to imply that operating the Panama Canal takes some special technology that only we Americans possess. You are operating tugs, which are operated around the world. You are operating valves and not little valves, big valves—there is not a little valve in the Panama Canal—these big things you turn around and you pull levers, stuff that was designed 70 years ago. And so to turn around and say that the Panamanians cannot operate that is not only an insult to the Panamanians. It is also an insult to the Members of this Senate to suggest that they might entertain such a thought.

So I thank my colleague from Rhode Island for yielding to me. I think the main qualifications are average intelligence and average manual dexterity, and you can do an excellent job keeping the canal area clean and greasing these big, big valves that have to operate.

I thank my colleague.

Mr. CHAFEE. Also, I think the point should be made that it is not tomorrow when they start running that canal, and by the way they are running 70 to 80 percent of the jobs anyway there. But let us hear from the Senator from Idaho who has some views.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank my able friend from Rhode Island for yielding. He has just made the observation I had intended to make. The latest figures show that about 75 percent of the employees presently engaged in operating the canal are Panamanians, and we have 22 years under this treaty to train other Panamanians to take over the remaining jobs.

Mr. GRAVEL. To give them manual dexterity.

Mr. CHURCH. Well, whatever may be required.

But I can hardly believe that anyone would seriously contend that Panamanians are inferior to the point where they cannot learn how to handle the rest of these jobs, despite a training period that will last for 22 years. As I recall, it was also said that the Egyptians could not operate the Suez Canal.

Mr. CHAFEE. How well I remember that. I remember the article in Life magazine about the pilots. No one could run that Suez Canal, because of pilots and the pilots were all foreigners, and those Egyptians could not pilot through that Suez Canal. We all fell for that. Life magazine told us. It was not true. They took over that canal and they put more tonnage through that canal than was ever put through before.

I agree with the Senator's point as to the view that somehow the Americans, the Northern industrial races, are so much better at operating anything than other countries.

Mr. CHURCH. When the Russians were arming the Egyptians, they trained the Egyptians to use advanced SAM missiles in 6 months. Now there is a really technical job, requiring a very high level of competency. The notion that the Panamanians are inferior, incompetent, and not up to the task of running the Panama Canal is, on its face, absurd.

But may I say to the Senator one other thing. The distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt) began to list a series of other alleged failures, in order to portray the Government of Panama as so incompetent that it cannot manage anything, not just first base, but second base, third base, the infield, and the outfield.

Among the examples that Senator Laxalt gave us were two I jotted down, of perhaps four or five he mentioned. One was the international airport, its abysmal failure.

Well, I was in Panama in January. The new international airport there does not even open for 6 months. It is not scheduled to be in operation until sometime this coming summer. Senator Laxalt's claim that airport is already a failure is a trifle premature.

The other example he gave was that of Cantadora Island. It just happens that members of the Foreign Relations Committee met with Omar Torrijos at the Cantadora Island resort. Now, that resort was originally built by a private company, not the Government of Panama. It was the private company that went bankrupt. The Government of Panama has tried to pick up the pieces, and when I was at Cantadora Island resort, I must say this: If it is now a failure, would that we had more failures of that sort in this country.

It was booked up until the end of April. It is an exceedingly popular resort, and the prospects for it have improved remarkably since the Panamanian Government took charge.

So, you know, these examples of alleged failure are not backed up by the facts, once you begin to examine them. I think it is not only demeaning to the people of Panama, but it is hardly a credit to the intelligence of the U.S. Senators, to propound objections of this kind to these treaties.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. I just wanted to add one further point, because I agree that it is sheer arrogance to contend that the Panamanian people do not have the competence to carry forward this endeavor.

The fact of the matter is that the next 22 years—that is a long, long transition period—will be spent with the United States still operating the canal and effecting the transition over to the Panamanians. And, of course, the same thing is true with respect to military cooperation.

Now, if by the end of the century Panama and its people are not prepared to assume this responsibility, if for a moment one were even to accept the thrust of the argument by the opponents of the treaties, if, by the end of the century, in 22 years' time, they are not then in a position to take over, that is an indictment of our capacity, the American capacity to accomplish that transition.

In other words, we have an opportunity there, given the way these treaties are phrased, to develop a partnership and to insure results. We have the opportunity to initiate the necessary training programs.

Almost 80 percent of the existing work force with respect to the Panama Canal is Panamanian, and I think we can clearly accomplish that transition. The Panamanians, I think, have the capacity to accomplish that transition, and the real question, then, is whether the Americans are prepared, in carrying forward their role over the next 22 years, to accomplish the transition. I think we can do it.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly for a followup observation?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. GRAVEL. When this great nation of ours wanted to advance in technology in space rocketry, what we did was bring over a German by the name of Wernher von Braun. So often, when we have made technological advances in our society, we did not hesitate to go hire a Dutchman, or whatever expert we needed. It is a common practice in the operations of both business and Government. So, if the Panamanians were tomorrow to get control of the canal, they would naturally go out and hire technicians to do the job properly; that is no big deal.

When I was there, I went to Cantadora, and I have been to Panama twice. I would ask anybody who has been to Panama and traveled around the world, have you noticed anything different in Panama than in any other place in the world? My observation is no, there is no difference, no better and no worse than any other place in the world.

I think when Members of the U.S. Senate stand here with sick Yankee arrogance, and that is really all I can term it, and look down our noses at other people as inferior, I think we demean the Senate and the great American people. We have been a melting pot; we bring in people from all over the world and absorb them, and make them a part of our great nation. These people are involved in all the spectrums of human activity. I think that kind of argument demeans us, and does us no service anywhere in the world.

I thank the Senator for being so generous with his time.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me for a question?

Mr. CHAFEE. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I have a few more remarks to make that I think might persuade him, but if perhaps—

Mr. ALLEN. It would possibly be best, then, to let me ask you now, before I am persuaded.

Mr. CHAFEE. I was thinking of that, but also that if you spoke now, you might leave me speechless.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to overburden the Senator, if he does not wish to yield at this time.

Mr. CHAFEE. I certainly will yield, yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator mentioned a few moments ago that General McAuliffe, who is the commander of our Southern Command position there, called attention to the fact that it is being stated—he is not quite able to identify the source of the statements—that we are going to cut our military bases in the Canal Zone from 14 down to 4, and he states that neither figure is correct. The Senator quoted from his testimony.

Well, of course, if there are 22 bases there instead of 14, reducing them down to 4 or some other number would be a greater reduction than is being stated as to the 14 bases that are to be cut down to a lower figure.

But as to the four bases that we are to be confined to for full control—there are some installations where we will have joint control, but, as I pointed out, there are side agreements three times as prolix as the treaties themselves, because they occupy over 60 pages, whereas the treaties occupy some 23 or 24 pages. If the Senator would refer—I am sure he has this booklet—if he would refer to page 29 of the side agreements, and I call them that because that is what they are—we do not have the right, according to the ruling of the Vice President, to amend these agreements—it is pointed out, near the bottom of page 29, in the first column, that the U.S. forces may use the different sites listed in paragraph (2) of annex A of this agreement.

When we turn over to paragraph (2) of annex A, there you find listed (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e), the five military installations, only four of them, however, on the mainland of the Canal Zone: Howard Air Force Base, Fort Clayton, Fort William D. Davis Military Reservation, Fort Sherman Military Reservation, and then the fifth military installation is on Galeta Island. So there, the Senator may surmise, is where the figure of four comes from.

But, going beyond that, we also find—to show how curious our defense position there is—for a period of 2 years our Government and the Panamanian Government examined the matter to determine whether four bases were not too many, to see if we could not give up some of those. With the trend toward giving away our very substance in this country to foreign nations, I have no doubt that there is a good chance that we will waive our right to one or more of these four bases. It is possible that we would have suicidal tendencies to pull out of all bases during the life of the first treaty.

Mr. CHAFEE. When the Senator describes the United States having suicidal tendencies, we have the capacity for those suicidal tendencies now. There is nothing written in stone that says we have to keep the bases we have in the zone now.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I think that is wrong. We are charged with the obligation, under the treaty, of defending the canal. I think everyone would agree that we would need troops to defend the canal.

Mr. CHAFEE. But we still have that obligation. I cannot follow why the Senator ascribes this greater suicidal tendency under these treaties.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not quite follow the Senator's line of argument. Here we are giving the canal away and we are making it less possible for us to defend the canal. Even under the leadership amendments, which we have discussed from time to time, which are before the Senate and determined to be necessary, it is provided in the leadership amendments that we will pull out all of our forces during this century. Where we would have the right to take steps to defend neutrality of the canal under the leadership amendments, it would be a far cry from being able to defend when all of our troops have been withdrawn. That is the difficulty of the leadership amendment which made it necessary for me to offer an amendment, which would require that the President, if he deems it necessary for the defense of the canal, to keep our military presence there beyond December 31, 1999, by so certifying that need to Panama prior to December 31, 1999.

Mr. GRAVEL. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield for a moment?

Mr. CHAFEE. I would like to see if the Senator from Alabama has completed first.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. CHAFEE. The Senator from Alaska wanted to make a point but I did not want to interrupt the thought of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield the floor.

Mr. CHAFEE. I will yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Chafee) is correct. We still have our obligation to defend this canal not only during the treaty but in perpetuity. That is what the treaty is all about. The Senator from Alabama I believe is in error. I believe Senator Chafee has pointed out the proper interpretation. The language is very clear.

With respect to the point just made by the Senator from Alabama that the President would decrease the troops, he can do that right now. There is no point that the Senator has not just stated which cannot happen to us right this minute without this treaty. So I do not think that is a valid point to be made against the Senator from Rhode Island in the explanation he has so ably put forward.

Mr. ALLEN. But the point is that where the leadership amendment gives us the right to defend in perpetuity it deprives us of the means with which to defend because we will withdraw from the Canal Zone. The only way we could defend the canal would be to have an amphibious landing or send in paratroops.

The amendment which is before the Senate now would give the President that right. The Senator says the President could withdraw, and that is true, but I do not believe he would do that. There would be a hue and cry against it.

Mr. GRAVEL. May I say to my distinguished friend from Alabama (Mr. Allen), for whom I have great respect, I think we both might take umbrage under more qualified military perceptions than he and I might have.

I merely want to quote the opening statement of General Wilson, the Commandant of the Marine Corps. He has probably had a few experiences running up a beach in the past. I will quote:

I do not believe, however, that successful defense of the canal is dependent upon continued U.S. military presence in Panama.

If my colleague is trying to make a case that this is a bad treaty because these options are left open, they obviously should be left open.

Of course, this was a statement by the general before the Armed Services Committee.

My colleague from Rhode Island has demonstrated too much patience with us and I again thank him for his generosity.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Senator.

I might say we will go into these points more deeply when we discuss the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Politically, these treaties will be for our benefit in other areas of the world besides Panama. By approving these treaties, the United States strengthens our friends throughout the world while proving wrong those who are hostile to us and claim that we are a bullying imperialist power.

Approval of these treaties eliminates that argument of those disruptive forces in the hemisphere who see the Panama Canal issue as fertile grounds for cultivating seeds of anti-Americanism.

Given the national security aspects of Panama, and we discussed these briefly a minute ago, our military leaders have participated right from the beginning in the negotiations of these treaties, in order to insure that our military interests are protected. Therefore, when the provisions of these treaties were made public, the Joint Chiefs of Staff were unanimous—every single one of those generals—in supporting the treaties.

I have been particularly impressed with the force and sincerity of the arguments supporting the treaties by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Brown.

Those who are familiar with General Brown know that he is not in the remotest sense of the word what we would call a "political" general. Therefore, we have to respect his word when he declares that in his personal opinion these treaties are in the best defense interests of the United States.

That is the only issue he addressed, the defense interests of the United States.

Like every Member of the Senate, I have been struck by the depth of feeling throughout our States, throughout the Nation, regarding these treaties.

I must say I do not think there has been a single issue which has come before the Senate in a good many years on which everybody in the United States seems to have a view. I suppose it comes from the fact that all of us in chapter 4 of our history books read about the Panama Canal.

Polls have disagreed on just what this public sentiment is, but it is clear, unquestionably, that these treaties are controversial, intensely controversial.

When the voters send a Representative to the House or a Senator to the Senate, that person is faced with a difficult philosophical dilemma. The question is simply, does he vote as public sentiment wishes, or, in those cases where there is public sentiment in conflict with his judgment, with his experience, does he vote as he thinks best in the interests of his State and his Nation?

Now, voting one's conscience sometimes places a public servant at loggerheads with a large number of his constituents. This obviously involves political risks and these political risks are not inconsequential. They can take the ultimate form of the politician being defeated. John F. Kennedy, in his book, "Profiles in Courage," addressed this subject, when he said:

Perhaps if the American people more fully comprehended the terrible pressures which discourage acts of political courage, which drive a Senator to abandon or subdue his conscience, then they might be less critical of those who take the easier road—and more appreciative of those still able to follow the path of courage.

Now, trying to vote strictly according to the wishes of the people, while politically popular, also has its hazards. It is pretty hard to define exactly what is public opinion, because it is a changing, fluid element. So, what do we do? Do we vote in accordance to the total amount of mail or the total number of telephone calls? Should every new issue be subject to some survey, just like Presidential campaigns seem to be?

It does not seem to me that any of these options is the best way for a public official to make up his mind. Rather, it seems to me incumbent on each of us to bring all our individual experience and our judgment, our analytical abilities, whatever they might be, to bear on studying the issue. It would be irresponsible to make ourselves hostage to what we perceive to be "public opinion."

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. Could I just finish this one thought? Then I shall be delighted to yield to my companion.

Mr. LAXALT. Yes.

Mr. CHAFEE. The Panama Canal issue is an example of the perils of relying upon existing casts of public opinion. I do not know what others find. My own mail count has fluctuated from being almost totally against the treaties in some weeks to where it has been, by a small margin, in favor of the treaties, then back to opposing the treaties. The national polls have differed on this subject, as you know. The polls have shown, that, at large, the people are against the treaties; but then, if you take that group who has taken the trouble to study them or understand them, those polls have shown that the people are more in favor of them, not overwhelmingly, but are in favor of them.

So my colleagues who oppose the treaty could easily produce evidence to show that the American people oppose them. But, frankly, I do not think this is the way we ought to make our decisions.

I am glad to yield.

Mr. LAXALT. I wish only to make this observation: I do not think a public opinion survey on the matter of where the constituency is going is conclusive. But I do think it should be highly persuasive. There have been statements made by our colleagues on the floor to the effect that they are going to turn their back on their constituencies and call their own shots. I suggest that that is one of the problems that we have here in Washington. I suggest that is one of the great problems we have in terms of the integrity and credibility of the Congress. There are millions of Americans who feel that we do not listen to them.

In my own case, we had a recent survey indicating that, even with the leadership amendment, 81 percent of the people of my State are strongly opposed to these treaties. Would I not be terribly derelict if that were not highly persuasive in my consideration of the vote of these treaties, I as the Senator?

Mr. CHAFEE. When the Senator says highly persuasive, I am not sure what he means by that, because these treaties affect the Nation. It really is a very serious national issue.

Mr. LAXALT. I am aware of that.

Mr. CHAFEE. It seems to me that each of us wears several hats. The hats we wear are not totally those of the Senator from Rhode Island or Nevada or North Carolina, or wherever it might be. We have an obligation to do what is best for our Nation as well.

Mr. LAXALT. I am aware of that. We have a dual responsibility, of course we do. But, in my own judgment, I do not feel that the national interest has to be completely dominating of our local constituencies and our local responsibilities.

Nor am I saying that it should be conclusive, because there are times, I suppose, that the winds of public opinion can be fanned into an improper result, or conclusion. I am aware of all that. Yet, in all the years I have been in this business, I have never seen more interest in an issue.

I might say I have never seen more knowledge exhibited by the public generally throughout this country in an issue. The quality of the mail I have, aside from the organized, postcard type mailing, is of high quality, exceedingly high quality. It seems to me that this is one of those rare issues where we must pay heed in great part to what the American people are telling us. I am afraid that, as far as many of our colleagues on the floor are concerned, we are not listening closely enough on this issue.

Mr. CHAFEE. I would hope that all Senators, obviously, would give heed, read their mail, and understand the views of their constituents. But I think we have an obligation to go further: that is, to study these issues in considerable depth, to recognize the views of our military leaders, those who are actively on the job, to give consideration to the thoughts of those who are in positions of responsibility regarding our foreign policy, our Secretary of State and others; to give consideration to what this holds for the future—not just this year or next year, but also, what are the alternatives: What is going to happen in the event that the treaties are not approved?

I do not think we should be subject to blackmail, or anything, that there are possibilities of turbulence. But, obviously, all of these things have to go into our equation. Based on these, we have to make our judgment.

Frequently—I am sure the Senator found this when he was Governor. I cannot believe that there were not occasions, and here he was dealing solely with a State issue principally—I suppose it came up in budgetary matters—where he had to take a position that was extremely unpopular, that the bulk of the people in his State were opposed to a position he took.

I had a similar situation dealing with a State income tax. Overwhelmingly, the people in our State were against it. As a matter of fact, I got voted out of office because of it. But it was a thing that had to be done. Subsequently, it was done, to preserve the financial integrity of our State.

So we cannot respond solely to the whims of the constituents, because their views change. And we come here with a considerable responsibility to think, it seems to me, not just of now but of the long range and the future, particularly as it involves the welfare of our Nation.

I think Senator Byrd, the majority leader, put this rather well in his opening comments when he said that a Senator is meant to reach a judgment not simply on the basis of mail count. If that were so, we could have a computer or we could have some organized pollster setup, and that is all we would need. Then he gave that really, I think, magnificent quote from Edmund Burke, where Burke said:

Your representative owes you not only his industry but also his judgment, and he betrays rather than serves you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

As we consider these treaties, I hope that, in looking at the world and America's role in it, we will act with confidence and with a vision to the future.

We are a great nation. There is no doubt about that.

We are a great nation because we are strong enough to do what we feel is right because it is right—not, like an adolescent youth, because we think we have to prove our might.

We are a great nation because we are confident enough to exert leadership and adjust in a growing world rather than cringe at the prospect of change and seek the reassuring shelter of bygone eras.

We are a great nation because we have the vision to look ahead and chart our course toward long-term stability of our best interests, because we realize that efforts in partnership are more secure than confrontations out of frustration.

Mr. President, we are a great nation because we seek to have our Government's decisions, in the words of Theodore Roosevelt—the builder of the canal—“laid on the foundations of righteousness and of decency.”

So, let us use those as our guidelines as we vote in these treaties and show what a great nation we are.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question or two?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. I commend the Senator for a statement that I know he believes in completely.

I ask the Senator this: Since the pending business is the amendment of the treaties proposed by Senator Allen and others, and recognizing that the Senator from Rhode Island, by reason of his general background and having been Secretary of the Navy, must have as a high priority the security interests of this country and of the capital—I know that is a high priority.

Mr. CHAFEE. No question about it.

Mr. LAXALT. And weighty consideration in his deliberations upon all these matters.

I have been concerned about this scenario and I think it is a realistic one. Under the terms of the treaties, we are going to have a gradual lessening of military power within the canal. I do not think it is disputable that come the year 2000, as far as the military presence in the Canal Zone is concerned, it is gone.

Mr. CHAFEE. It could be. I think the Senator's point is valid, although I do think we have got to keep in mind that we have entered all over this world into negotiations and agreements with foreign powers to provide for American forces there.

For example, Subic Bay in the Philippines, a magnificent, mammoth naval installation which we have got out in the Philippines.

Look at Forrejon, a base in Spain, and Rota, a base in Spain, where American naval forces are today.

It is all worked out with independent countries, just as I anticipate we will work out some kind of arrangement with Panama.

Mr. LAXALT. That is precisely what I am talking about. Under the terms of these agreements, at this point, when this country has the greatest leverage, that type agreement has not been worked out.

Under the terms of this agreement, in the year 2000 we have no military presence, per se, within the zone.

I find it terribly hard to believe why there would be any resistance to the type amendment Senator Allen has presently pending before the Senate which would provide, not automatically, but a bona fide certification by the President of the United States that our military presence was required within the Canal Zone, that that military presence be maintained, if we take that in the context of statements from our retired Joint Chiefs of Staff, I think a vast majority of the retired flag officers in this country oppose these treaties on the basis it is a vital strategic asset and we better protect it.

It seems to me the so-called leadership amendment, while giving us a legal right for prior passage, while giving us a right to protect our neutrality, is a naked legal right only as a practical matter. If we enter into difficulties with the Panamanians, we are going to be left in the position of having to fight either by sending in paratroopers or an amphibious landing.

This amendment presently under discussion, it seems to me, would greatly minimize that kind of risk because we already have a military presence there to protect our interests as well as the Panamanians.

I would like the Senator's comments and suggestions concerning the pending amendment in this context.

Mr. CHAFEE. Again, the pending amendment, as I understand it, the Senator can correct me, gives the United States a unilateral right to make this decision. That is the very thing that has proved so irritating to the Panamanians and would prove irritating to us.

If France had the unilateral right to reestablish bases in Florida, or the Soviets had a unilateral right to put a base in Alaska—they once owned it, should they not have that right—it would irk us more.

I do not think we would find a single American that would support that proposition.

This is the same kind of arrangement suggested here that we cram down the Panamanians' throats.

Mr. GRAVEL. Will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Chafee) is totally correct.

What this Allen amendment does is establish in perpetuity the right of the U.S. Government under the President of the United States to have troops in Panama as long as we ever want.

If my colleague from Nevada is so intent on an accommodation, what he ought to do is come in here with an amendment that talks about our willingness to pay for these things. We pay every place else in the world. Why would we have such an attitude that in Panama we are not going to make that kind of consideration?

This amendment is preposterous, truly preposterous.

Because of the Panama Canal and because we have got some minor economic interest—and I submit that by the year 2000 that will be not minor, but miniscule—why would we want to foist upon a legitimate sovereign nation—a legitimate sovereign nation—our ability to put troops on their soil.

That is what we had the revolution in this country over. Why would we want to insist upon that?

I just cannot understand this amendment. Now, that is not talking to the fact that this amendment is in the wrong place. I will not make a germaneness argument over that.

Mr. CHAFEE. I do not think we want to get into side arguments.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, who has the floor? I assume it is the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. I would be delighted to yield for some more comments.

Mr. LAXALT. Only this comment, in response to the Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel).

The reason why we feel we have to have his right, it necessarily must be unilateral. I am trying to guard against that contingency when the year 2000 comes that Panamanians are not going to be all that happy with us. It has been developed during the course of these debates that there are many areas of potential friction. I put that in the context, and as I indicated, you can disagree with it if you want, I do not choose to, that this is a vital strategic asset to the interests of this country and to the interests of the hemisphere and, certainly, to the interests of the Panamanians.

Now, constantly, when we think about rights of this type during the debate on this floor, we are being cast in the position of being a spoiler, a bad guy, whose interests are inimical to the Panamanian interests.

I do not understand that because if I were a leader in Panama I would welcome this kind of provision being in the agreement, recognizing that our military presence there will protect the canal and the Panamanian interests.

Mr. Gravel addressed the Chair.

Mr. LAXALT. If that is a preposterous approach——

Mr. GRAVEL. It is.

Mr. LAXALT. I suggest that the treaties are preposterous.

Mr. GRAVEL. Will my colleague say, if he thinks the leadership of Panama ought to accept in perpetuity U.S. troops, if he would be prepared to accept British or French troops in perpetuity in any part of the United States?

Mr. LAXALT. Of course not.

Mr. GRAVEL. But why would my colleague hold a different standard for the national sovereignty of the people of Panama than he would for a U.S. citizen?

Mr. LAXALT. Because it is our canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. Who says it is our canal?

Mr. LAXALT. I do, and so do millions of Americans.

Mr. GRAVEL. It is not our canal. We went into the history of how we got that canal.

But why should we threaten these people?

I ask my colleague from Nevada, does he have any guess as to how economically important the Panama Canal will be in the year 2000? Could he enlighten us?

Mr. LAXALT. No. I think it is a matter of speculation.

Mr. GRAVEL. Well——

Mr. LAXALT. Just a minute.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am sorry.

Mr. LAXALT. I think anybody would concede that the economic situation in 2000 is necessarily speculative. We can hear from both sides. Some would denigrate its economic importance, others maximize it.

I do not know. I am not as concerned about that as I am where we will be from a security standpoint in the year 2000.

I cannot predict that. The Senator cannot predict that. Nobody can predict that. So that is the situation.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I think I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LAXALT. May I pursue this for a moment?

Mr. CHAFEE. I would prefer to pursue the security point, if we could stay on that.

Mr. LAXALT. I would like to stay on that. We can talk economics forever and already have.

To get to the security point, recognizing that no one of us can foresee what the situation is going to be in 2000, I do not care how we define the opinion between existing Joint Chiefs and those who oppose it, feelings of the Joint Chiefs, I do not care how.

The least we can say is that there is divided opinion among the military experts about the strategic value of the canal.

So it seems to me if that is going to be the case in the year 2000, why not build in a safeguard in this treaty so that the President of the United States in terms of national interest can make a finding upon a certification and thereby continue a military presence?

I fail for the life of me to see how anybody thinking in terms of the national interests of this country can oppose this kind of amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE. It seems to me that we have a very fundamental difference of opinion here, and the difference is on this point: Do we want the Panamanians enthusiastic partners with us in this enterprise?

Mr. LAXALT. Surely, we do.

Mr. CHAFEE. Or do we want the Panamanians to be subordinates, to have their situation really remain not greatly changed?

If we want them on our team, we have to respect them and respect their nation. For us to have worked out a provision that gives us unilaterally the right to go back in there if in our opinion the neutrality of that canal is threatened is an extraordinary thing. I do not think any of us would ever accept such a term in a treaty.

Now the Senator from Nevada is trying to press it one step more and to say that we can keep troops in there at our own volition, unilaterally. That is going just too far. I do not think the Senator can expect any self-respecting Panamanian to go for such an arrangement.

Mr. LAXALT. Certainly, the Senator is not going to place the feelings of the Panamanians ahead of the national interests and security of this country. I hope that is not his judgment.

Mr. CHAFEE. No. My objective is to keep the canal open and operating.

Mr. LAXALT. I think we are both proceeding along the same path.

Let us assume that in 2000 we are out of there, no military presence, and that we have difficulties with the Panamanians. I hope that is not the case. Let us assume they are serious difficulties. Under the terms of this treaty, we cannot intervene to protect neutrality or prior passage, if it involves invasion of their internal affairs. In that type of situation, if we have that type of difficulty, I ask the Senator, as a former naval person, how in the world are we going to reinforce those rights properly, in the absence of dropping paratroops in there or making an amphibious invasion of Panama?

Mr. CHAFEE. We would have to do it; no question about that.

Mr. LAXALT. Is not that prospect far more onerous, in terms of our future relationships with Panama, rather than having a military presence there to begin with, in order to obviate that kind of problem?

Mr. CHAFEE. I do not agree with the Senator. It seems to me that we have a treaty here. A good deal, in my judgment, is something both sides want. We have gone a long way in asserting our views in this treaty. There is no question about it.

The provision that permits us to go in unilaterally, as I mentioned previously, is something that must be pretty tough for the Panamanian patriots to swallow.

Mr. LAXALT. All I hear on this floor is the feelings of the Panamanians, the Panamanians' aspirations, and the Panamanian patriots. I think part of our consideration should be the feelings of the American people and the feelings of the American patriots. They feel rather strongly about this issue, too. We seem constantly to shunt that aside, beating our breasts in some form of artificial guilt, in my opinion, and in the process—and this concerns me more than anything else—perhaps jeopardizing the national security of this country.

Mr. CHAFEE. It seems to me, following the Senator's argument to its logical extent, that we would have no treaty whatsoever.

Mr. LAXALT. That would be perfectly all right with me.

Mr. CHAFEE. In the Senator's judgment, no treaty.

Mr. LAXALT. No new treaty.

Mr. CHAFEE. If our objective is to keep the canal open and to maintain the status quo so far as the operation and maintenance of the canal are concerned, does the Senator suggest that the absence of any treaty, to remain the way we are now, with the zone and the governor, would promote the open, efficient use of the canal for the future?

Mr. LAXALT. Yes, I believe so. I am satisfied, from talking to the people there, that we have the military capability to easily protect that canal.

I am not being placed in the posture that we should not make other types of concessions. We want to protect the operational facility with U.S. military capability. That does not mean we cannot think in terms of making economic concessions of various kinds to the Panamanians—release of additional Canal Zone ground. What we are talking about is the fundamental consideration, basically, of preserving that asset.

Mr. CHAFEE. It is the judgment of the proponents of the treaties, of which I am one, that the best way to preserve the independence of the canal, to maintain it, to have it serve its purposes for the remainder of this century and into the next one, is to agree to these treaties, to have the Panamanians part of the cooperative effort.

Mr. LAXALT. I say to the Senator from Rhode Island that that, really, is the essence of our disagreement. Those of us who oppose these treaties feel that to enter in this kind of partnership can only harm the security interests of this country.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield.

Mr. GRAVEL. There is one item that was mentioned which I think is very serious. It occurred when the Senator from Nevada was trying to keep on the subject raised by the Senator from Rhode Island, and I thought it was a very good colloquy that took place, in view of the expertise of the Senator from Rhode Island, who has been Secretary of the Navy and knows something about maritime matters and defensive matters. I have personal affection for my colleague from Nevada, and sometimes I am distraught by the fact that he beats me so resoundingly at tennis.

I am disturbed about one point—the cavalier way in which we put aside the economic arguments. To stand on this floor and ask for the power to infringe upon the sovereignty of the Panamanian nation for perpetuity—I hope there is some sound economic logic behind that. Otherwise, what is the point of stationing troops abroad? It must be to defend something that is valuable to us. I think the crux, the touchstone, of any argument has to be the economic basis.

When I asked my colleague from Nevada if he had given thought as to what the economic importance of the Panama Canal would be in the year 2000, he said he could not speculate. I would like to propound a question to my colleague, if he would have any doubt as to the economic importance of the canal today; and I would inquire about the economic importance not only to the United States, but I also would ask him what percentage of the world's maritime fleet presently can go through the canal, to get some barometer of the importance of this canal economically today. Maybe upon that basis, we could speculate for the future.

Mr. LAXALT. I am not familiar with the precise tonnage, except that I know I do know—and I can secure the figures—that there is substantial commercial use of the canal. It has tremendous eco-conomic benefit to the people of this country, principally the mining and the agricultural interests. It has tremendous economic value to our allies throughout Latin America and South America.

I know there has been an effort on the part of the proponents of this treaty to denigrate the economic value of the canal. I submit that there is still substantial economic value in the Panama Canal. In terms of specifics, I can provide that to the Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) and make it part of the record.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague. I would like him to cause his staff to research this area and bring forth these statistics, because I think it will be very revealing to the American people.

I will give the Senator a statistic that I picked up in research houses from Norway to London to Washington, D.C. Presently, 57 percent of the world tonnage of the world's maritime fleet cannot go through the Panama Canal. Fifty-seven percent. It is a very shocking figure.

If you project out the next 22 years, to the year 2000, and if you extrapolate the growth that took place in the last 15 years, not at an equal rate or even at one-half of that rate, but if you extrapolate at only one-third of the previous rate to the year 2000, you get a figure in excess of 90 percent of the tonnage of the world's maritime fleet that will not be able to go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. Where did the Senator get these amazing figures?

Mr. GRAVEL. From the research outfits that do the research for the shipowners of the world.

Mr. HELMS. Who is the president of it—Mr. Omar Torrijos? [Laughter]

Mr. GRAVEL. Oh, no. It is a company in Oslo, Norway, which has very little contact with Mr. Torrijos. It is a company in London called Drury. It is companies in the United States. It is the Maritime Administration.

I will go into it at great length, showing charts that will cover the rear of this Chamber with the research data. If my colleague quarrels with it, or can find error with these figures, this research data, I will stand here on the floor and apologize to my colleague.

Mr. HELMS. Then the Senator better get ready to apologize, because 95 percent of the vessels afloat in the world today can go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. Say that again.

Mr. HELMS. Ninety-five percent of the vessels afloat in the world today can go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. What about the tonnage?

Mr. HELMS. The Senator was talking about—

Mr. GRAVEL. It does not do us any economic good to count the little pleasure crafts or little bitty rust buckets that go through the canal. Let us talk tonnage. The numbers of vessels do not matter. What matters is how much oil can you move through the canal, how much coal, that my colleague from Nevada talks about, how much coal you can move through the canal. Is my colleague aware that 76 percent of all the oil tonnage in the world cannot go through the canal?

Mr. HELMS. I do not think anybody is aware of that. It is simply not so.

Mr. GRAVEL. He can line up 6,000 rust buckets that can carry three drops of oil apiece, and they can all go through the canal. Big deal. One supertanker will take through 1 million times more than that.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator can shout me.

Mr. GRAVEL. I yield to my colleague to make his statement.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. I have great respect for the Senator from North Carolina. I apologize if my voice has been raised in harshness. It was not any indication of any disaffection for my colleague. Quite the contrary. It is because of the zeal that I have over these important figures which I think are so illuminating.

I will be happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. GRAVEL. Unfortunately I do not have that power. It is the Senator from Rhode Island who has that power.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I wonder if we could get in order who is next because I have completed my remarks, and it was my understanding that the Senator from Alaska was next. I am willing to do whatever Senators want to do here. What is the situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DeConcini). After the Senator from Rhode Island is finished, the floor is open. There is no order for recognition.

The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Thank you, Mr. President.

Does the Senator from New York have comments?

Mr. JAVITS. No; I understand Senator Gravel is going to follow the Senator; is that right?

Mr. CHAFEE. We are waiting for Senator Gravel. Meanwhile, the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I have some statistical information on the way to the Senate Chamber. I suggest that we have a brief quorum call.

Mr. JAVITS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I would like to continue my initial presentation, the presentation that I began before we went into recess last week.

I tried to cover some elements of the history that found us in the situation that we are in today. Now I would like to continue on, and focus on the operations of the canal.

Mr. HATCH. Will the distinguished Senator from Alaska yield for a question?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would be happy to yield for a question.

Mr. HATCH. It is my understanding that my friend from Alaska is contending that the tonnage going through the canal is not really very heavy.

Mr. GRAVEL. I did say that the tonnage was not heavy.

Mr. HATCH. In other words, what is the significance of the canal to the Americans?

Mr. GRAVEL. I think Americans are not aware as to the present economic significance of the canal or its projected economic significance.

Mr. HATCH. Am I correct in my assumption that one of the reasons that the Senator feels the canal is not so significant concerns the fact that the supertankers cannot go through the canal?

Mr. GRAVEL. The statement I made earlier was that 76 percent of the tonnage of the world tanker shipping cannot use the canal today. Forty-four percent of the bulk cargo tonnage in the world today cannot use the Panama Canal. Those two are the two most significant areas of the world maritime fleet. But when we average the total maritime fleet, 57 percent of all the maritime tonnage in the world today cannot go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. HATCH. That, I assume, is because of the supertankers, the few ships in the world which cannot go through the Panama Canal. But I might add they cannot dock in most of the world's ports.

Mr. GRAVEL. I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. They are so large they cannot dock in most of the ports of the world is that not true?

Mr. GRAVEL. That is not so.

Mr. HATCH. Yes; it is.

Mr. GRAVEL. The vessels which carry oil from Alaska are on the order of 120,000 tons.

Mr. HATCH. But they cannot——

Mr. GRAVEL. Excuse me. They cannot go through the Panama Canal today but they can be handled on the east coast of the United States. If my colleague is trying to make the inference that the figure I am giving with respect to obsolescence of the canal is also relative to the obsolescence of the port facilities, that is not accurate. If my colleague wants to make that argument, what he ought to do is to dispatch some of his staff to research the obsolescence of the ports in relationship to the world maritime tonnage.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. We have already done our research. But what the Senator referred to is not my argument. I think the port facilities in the United States of America are fairly adequate. In fact, I believe we have great port facilities. It is my understanding that many critics raise the fact that the supertankers cannot go through the canal, and, therefore, the canal is not quite as significant as we would think. I just want to point out that the new supertankers were designed so that they could go through the canal, so that they would not have to travel the longer way. Also, the largest supertankers cannot dock in most of the ports in this world.

Mr. GRAVEL. May I ask my colleague what he calls a supertanker? Can he give the size?

Mr. HATCH. We are talking about the huge supertankers being built in Japan at this time.

Mr. GRAVEL. What is the size of the vessels that can go through the Panama Canal?

Mr. HATCH. As I understand it, 95 percent of all the world's shipping can go through the canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is not what I asked. I asked my colleague what is the size of a vessel that can go through the Panama Canal right now?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator has asked me a question and I would be happy to answer it. As I understand it, all of our military vessels, except for the 13 largest carriers, can go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is not what I asked the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the Senator will wait a moment.

That is 98 percent of the military vessels.

Mr. GRAVEL. Excuse me, but I yielded the floor for a question and my colleague is engaging in a colloquy. I am happy to answer his question directly.

I am asking a specific question: How wide a vessel, what is the draft? Is it 30,000 deadweight tons that can go through the canal, 100,000 deadweight tons? That is what this is all about.

Mr. HATCH. Let me answer that. No. 1, 98 percent of all military vessels. Only 13 of the largest carriers cannot go through the canal.

No. 2, 95 percent of the world's fleet can go through the canal. No. 3—

Mr. GRAVEL. I must not remain silent when my colleague says 95 percent of the world's fleet can go through the canal. That is not accurate. Is the Senator counting vessels or tonnage?

Mr. HATCH. I am counting vessels.

Mr. GRAVEL. Is not tonnage more important than vessels? You may have 100 small vessels and one big vessel that can carry as much as 100 smaller vessels. That is a ridiculous argument.

I ask my colleague if the 95 percent is based on tonnage. What is the tonnage that can go through the canal?

Mr. HATCH. Basically, 95 percent of all the tonnage in the world could go through the canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. I cannot yield to that point. I will not accept that because it is not true. I went to great length to show the figures, to show what the facts are—they are simple—all the tonnage, not the number of vessels.

So the public can understand the Senator, he is saying that 95 percent of all the vessels in the world can go through the Panama Canal. My answer is that is, "Big deal." There can be a whole lot of midget vessels going through the canal. The question is how much tonnage can go through the canal? I will give the figure. The figure is 57 percent of the world tonnage cannot go through the canal today.

Mr. HATCH. So the Senator thinks 43 percent can go through the canal?

Mr. GRAVEL. That is right.

Mr. HATCH. That is pretty substantial.

Let me answer the question asked before. As we know, vessels transiting the Panama Canal are limited to 40 feet in depth, 950 feet in length and with a 106 foot beam. Ships larger than that cannot go through the canal. That includes 13 of our largest carriers, some of the supertankers, and some other ships that are larger.

Mr. GRAVEL. Not all the supertankers.

Mr. HATCH. I said some of the supertankers.

Mr. GRAVEL. Is an 80,000-ton tanker covered by your statement?

Mr. HATCH. No.

Mr. GRAVEL. So we have a lot of vessels that cannot go through the canal but that can dock at Hampton Roads, at New York, and New Orleans.

Mr. HATCH. I understand what the distinguished Senator is saying.

Let me ask this: Of the oil coming out of the north slope of Alaska, how much of that oil is going through the canal?

Mr. GRAVEL. Well, if we had full capacity—it would be somewhere between 400,000 and 500,000 barrels per day.

Mr. HATCH. And what percentage is it now?

Mr. GRAVEL. The Alaskan pipeline capacity is 1.2 million.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is asking—

Mr. GRAVEL. Between 30 and 40 percent of the capacity of the Alaskan pipeline will be going through the Panama Canal.

Mr. HATCH. That is not my question. My question is, How much of the total Alaskan oil coming out of the pipeline is going through the canal as of right now?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would say of the capacity of the line—

Mr. HATCH. Not the capacity. Does the Senator mean present capacity?

Mr. GRAVEL. Thirty or forty percent, thereabouts.

Mr. HATCH. That is present capacity?

Mr. GRAVEL. No, no.

Mr. HATCH. I was asking about present capacity. How much of the present capacity goes through the Panama Canal?

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not have that figure. I would say somewhere around 100,000 or less.

Mr. HATCH. Is it virtually 100 percent of the oil that comes to the east coast from Alaska?

Mr. GRAVEL. Oh, no.

Mr. HATCH. It is not?

Mr. GRAVEL. Did the Senator say 100 percent?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. GRAVEL. Preposterous.

The only oil going through the Panama Canal from Alaska right now is that oil that is declared surplus to the west coast. That surplus will not be great until the full capacity of the line comes in.

Right now, it is—I might enlighten my colleagues:

What it does is come down from Valdez Harbor into Balboa Bay in tankers of about 100,000 to 120,000 deadweight tons. It is transferred into the very, very large supertankers, on the order of about 250,000 deadweight tons. Then vessels of 65,000 deadweight tons or less come in, take the oil out of the tanker, then truck on through the canal and on up to the ports of the gulf coast in the United States and some minor ones on the east coast.

Mr. HATCH. I think the Senator is correct. I apologize for not phrasing my question correctly.

That question is this: Other than that oil that stays on the west coast of the United States—remember, I am talking about the oil that goes to the gulf coast and the east coast of the United States.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am sorry, I did not hear the question.

Mr. HATCH. The oil that comes from Alaska and goes to the gulf coast refineries and east coast refineries, where most of the refineries of the United States are, how much of that oil goes through the canal, from Alaska?

Mr. GRAVEL. Right now?

Mr. HATCH. Right now.

Mr. GRAVEL. I would think less than 100,000 barrels a day.

Mr. HATCH. That oil that does not go to oil refineries on the west coast or is not used otherwise on the west coast.

Mr. GRAVEL. Very little, until—you see, there is no surplus on the west coast. There are refineries on the west coast that can handle the oil. What we are talking about essentially is the oil that Sohio has. That is the reason they have an application to move it from Long Beach, to move it to Texas by pipeline. For the time being, that is why we are going to have to move it through the canal in this very inefficient process.

Mr. HATCH. I understand. So the oil that does come through, that is not utilized on the west coast, because of the limited delivery of oil right now through the Alyeska pipeline—the oil that does come to the east coast goes through the canal. That is all I am asking, if that is true.

All the oil from Alaska which is refined on the gulf coast and on the east coast of the United States, where the principal refineries in this country are, comes through the Panama Canal at the present time.

Mr. GRAVEL. If there is any oil going through, it goes through the Panama Canal. I would be happy to make that stipulation. I just do not understand how the Senator is coming at it from that direction, because there is no oil that I know of that is coming out of California or the west coast of the United States and purposely going through the Panama Canal to get to the gulf coast and the east coast. That just is not happening, not projected to happen. What we have is oil that will come down from Alaska that will be surplus to the refinery capacity of the west coast and, therefore, will have to go through the Panama Canal or go around Cape Horn.

Mr. HATCH. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. GRAVEL. I would have been happy to state that if he had asked it straightaway.

Mr. HATCH. That oil is going to increase to the total capacity of the Alyeska pipeline of about 1.2 million barrels a day.

Mr. GRAVEL. The oil that will then go through the Panama Canal would probably be somewhere between 400,000 and 500,000 barrels a day when we get the capacity of the pipeline up to 1,200,000.

Mr. HATCH. That would be the 30 to 40 percent the Senator talked about earlier?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes, of the present capacity.

Mr. HATCH. I think the disagreement we have had on the floor is because of the way I asked my questions and the way the Senator interpreted them. Let me ask the question in a different way.

If the Panama Canal is shut down, for whatever reason, assuming the pipeline is at full capacity, how could that affect Alaska and the Gulf Coast and east coast refineries, which will be dependent on Alaskan oil to help reduce some of the energy prices we have in this country?

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not think I understood the question.

Is the point the Senator is trying to make that the canal is important to the transshipment—

Mr. HATCH. I think even the distinguished Senator from Alaska would admit that it is extremely important, even though it does not take care of all the world's tonnage, even though it takes care, in the opinion of the Senator from Alaska, of only 40 or 45 percent of the world's tonnage, or at least can. My question is: What economic effect will there be to Alaska if the pipeline reaches its limit or capacity of 1 million 2 barrels a day? Will not the cost of oil coming through the canal increase under these treaties because of the higher tolls? Will not the cost to consumers in America go up accordingly? And if the canal is shut down, will not we have even more of an energy crunch and difficulty than we have today in America?

Mr. GRAVEL. Not at all.

Mr. HATCH. I would be most interested in hearing the explanation of that.

Mr. GRAVEL. Let me give the figures.

First of all, if Sohio can get the permit to move oil through Long Beach, from Long Beach Harbor, they have to build a short pipe up to the Redlands in California. Then they go from the Redlands into Midland, Tex. There are two gas lines already in place that are underutilized. Therefore, the Sohio Co. purchased from El Paso, the gas line company, these lines. If they get approval to move the oil, the oil will move from Valdez to Midland, Tex., into a system that can get into Chicago and the entire United States. It will cost $2.06 per barrel to do that.

Mr. HATCH. What if we are unable to do that because of the Environmental Protection Agency and all the other difficulties, the overregulation of Government and all these problems that exist with regard to anything having to do with oil, energy, transportation, and other facilities? As the Senator knows, the pipeline in Alaska was held up for years, to the cost of billions of dollars, by environmental and other problems.

Mr. GRAVEL. If we are unintelligent and unable, as a nation, to make intelligent decisions, I would hope we would not blame it on the Panamanians or the Panama Canal. If we are dumb, I hope we will be able to stand up to a mirror and say, "We are dumb."

Mr. HATCH. We should do that every day.

Mr. GRAVEL. Let me give the Senator the figures to show how ignorant we can be.

I just showed where we have two pipelines in existence that are underutilized. There is a company prepared to utilize them. They have spent a lot of money on the engineering.

Mr. HATCH. They do not own them?

Mr. GRAVEL. It will cost $2.06 a barrel to go through that to Houston. If it goes through the Panama Canal, it costs $2.46. We are now paying $2.46 a barrel—more than it would cost us if we went ahead and built the pipeline.

The Senator is saying that this canal is real important to us, because if we lose it, we will not be able to move the oil. We have the facility. The problem is we are not doing it, and shame on us, because we are not smart enough to move it the cheapest way possible.

If you want to take the next step, even more efficient than that, we do not have to look at the canal. We could export our oil to Japan and swap with them, because it is cheaper, time and distance-wise, to move that oil to Japan. You take the savings involved, and tell the Japanese, "We will split even-stein with you. We will take 50 cents"—it is about $1 saving—"You keep 50 cents," and we will decrease the cost of oil coming into Houston or New York by 50 cents a barrel by the amount we swap.

There are a lot of intelligent things that we could do that are not immediately germane to this argument.

What was the point my colleague wanted to make?

Mr. HATCH. I have to admit that the Senator has given us some very interesting alternatives, none of which is presently in fruition, none of which is presently even possible. The pipeline is run by a private company. Sohio does not have the access to them, if we are to accept his particular assertions. He is assuming that the pipeline people would not charge one extra penny to bring oil in if they were to have a virtual monopoly if the Panama Canal is shut down.

Mr. GRAVEL. Maybe my colleague is not aware of the fact that we control the rates of return of pipelines. They have to file their tariffs. In fact, we have litigation right now in Alaska as to what that tariff is. The companies think it ought to be one thing, the Federal Government and the States think it ought to be another.

The inference that the Senator is trying to give to the American public listening to him is that the pipelines can hold people up without the Government doing anything. We have a ton of law that deals with that subject. My colleague is a little bit on weak ice.

Mr. HATCH. I would have to say that my colleague is a little bit on weak ice, because in order to put his scheme together, he would have to override private interests, which our country has not done thus far. He would also have to interfere with the orderly transmission of natural gas. He is assuming all of this can be done in an orderly, efficient manner, when we have seen, year after year, the Alaska pipeline held up by the Federal Government, even when we need it because we are 50 percent dependent on foreign oil, gas, and supplies. So that is how much force that has in this regard.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague for that compliment.

Mr. HATCH. I think the Senator's suggestion is excellent.

Mr. GRAVEL. Construction of the Alaska pipeline is the only thing that has been done, appreciably, to solve the energy crisis in this country.

I thank my colleague for bringing that event to the attention of the public.

Mr. HATCH. I am glad to be able to do so.

I thank the people of Alaska for the efforts they put forth trying to alleviate our country's energy crisis.

Mr. GRAVEL. I think we ought to thank the Lord, because the Lord put our oil there. We are very blessed and proud of it, but I do not think we claim any intellectual prowess over the fact that we stand on top of oil.

Mr. HATCH. I guess the Senator does not know the same Alaskans I know, then.

Mr. GRAVEL. Most Alaskans I know are intellectual, intelligent, bright, strong, courageous, forthright people.

Mr. HATCH. Well, they must all be like the people out there in Utah.

As a matter of fact, the ones I know, with very few exceptions, I would have to agree with the Senator on those comments.

Mr. GRAVEL. But I do not know of any Alaskan that claims we are responsible for the oil. I think we accept it as blessing. We are very happy with the blessing because we are a high-cost area and have suffered great poverties in the past. This affords us an opportunity to get up to the table. We do not have to pick up crumbs any more. We are not any better off than anybody else.

Mr. HATCH. I commend the Senator and I agree with him on that. I am proud of the Alaskans and we will fight alongside Senator Stevens to try to protect Alaska from the ravages of the Federal Government, which we do very little of here in the Senate.

I would like to say this. I think the Senator brought some interesting things to light today. He testified before our committee and I was interested in his comments then. The only problem is he has made some very big assumptions which, personally, I wish could come to fruition because it would be beneficial to America if they could, but I do not believe they will.

My assumption is that if we lose the Panama Canal, we are going to have an energy crunch and an energy crisis in this country that is even compounding that which we have right now.

Mr. GRAVEL. How are we going to lose the Panama Canal? What this whole exercise is about, the reason why four Presidents, why we have been negotiating for 13 years and come forward with this treaty is so we can guarantee access, to ourselves and to other maritime countries, to the Panama Canal.

Why does the Senator stand there and say that we are going to lose the Panama Canal? Nobody is going to lose the Panama Canal, even in the year 2000, unless it is obsolete.

Now, if there are no vessels going through the Panama Canal, I think the best thing to do is close it, put a plaque on the front of the Miraflores Lock and sell tourist tickets. That is probably the only money they will make off it.

But we are assuming that if it has economic viability, that viability is more important to the people of Panama than any other group of people in the world.

So why stand there and tell us we are losing the canal, because if that viability is real, we will be able to use it. If we do not use it, they do not make any money.

What is the inference here that we stand up and say the Panamanian people are so dumb, we will give them an asset and they will promptly destroy it. Why say that?

Mr. HATCH. Would the Senator yield for an answer to that?

Mr. GRAVEL. Why did the Senator insist on reference to these Panamanian people as inferior when——

Mr. HATCH. I did nothing——

Mr. GRAVEL. They are——

Mr. HATCH. I respect my colleague from Alaska, but I resent his inference from what I have said because I never called the Panamanian people inferior. In fact, I said that I loved them.

Mr. GRAVEL. My colleague said the canal would be closed.

Mr. HATCH. That is not the point. It had nothing to do with the Senator's inference that the Panamanian people may be inferior.

What I was saying was this: The very same people who argued that Cuba could never do without American commerce and the American industry, and the purchase of sugar or cigars, made the same arguments then that Cuba was so dependent economically upon the United States and upon what we did for them that it was very unlikely that Cuba would ever drop relationships with the United States.

But they did, and why? Because Russia poured billions of dollars down that sewer every year, and why would it not be equally as wise for Russia——

Mr. GRAVEL. Does my colleague think the whole Russian fleet will circle South America, going through the Panama Canal, to raise revenues for the Panamanian people?

Mr. HATCH. I yielded to the Senator to answer, if he will extend me the same courtesy.

Mr. GRAVEL. I apologize.

Mr. HATCH. No need to. We are friends, I have great respect for the Senator.

The fact of the matter is that I think it would be a pretty smart thing for the Russians if they want a crunch on our supplies, our military security and transferability of agricultural supplies and commodities, and put hundreds of billions of dollars of extra cost on Americans, for them to give the Panamanians $1.5 billion, which is a lot more than the $250 million they may be able to get out of the canal, or, as a matter of fact, as $70 million a year. And if they did shut it down, I am suggesting Alaska will suffer, this country will suffer. And if they do not shut it down, it is going to cost us more for Alaskan oil as a result of higher tolls, because your scheme cannot be put into effect immediately. I wish it could—especially in the expeditious, indiscriminate, and inexpensive manner in which the United States has always operated the canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. Well, if I could respond to the question of my colleague from Utah and the analogy he makes with Cuba, I think they are very faulty.

First, I do not recall anybody standing around on the Senate floor yelling about this situation, that situation, before Cuba parted ways with us economically.

We had a trade relationship with Cuba, from some point of view; when they ruptured that relationship they had to find other people to trade with.

That is not the way with Panama.

It is a physical asset there. The bridge. The pass between the seas is there. You cannot pick that up and sell it in another part of the world. We use one-third of the canal because we have a lot of traffic from the east coast of the United States to the west coast of the United States.

I cannot conceive that the Panamanian leadership would say, "Boy, we are in a brouhaha with the United States, we will get mad and not let the United States go through the canal. We will let everybody else, but we will cut out one-third of the revenue capriciously because we are mad at the United States."

Can you see the scenario?

Now, we have the specter of somebody else coming in like the Russians did in buying Cuban sugar. We are going to see the Russians come in and help the Panamanians. So what we will see is a decision made in the politburo of the Soviet Union to tell the people on the east coast, in the Baltic Sea, and all of the eastern part of the Soviet Union, that they will load up all the Russian commercial vessels and send them through the Panama Canal to get to Vladivostok just so the Soviet Union can cause some earnings to take place for the benefit of Panama. I cannot think of a more ridiculous comparison.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. Let me finish. I tried to be patient as I could with my colleague when he was posing the question and making the analogy.

I think we can appreciate our mutual zeal. I want to make this point, and it is important.

People say this is like Cuba and the Communists and all that. That is a lot of rot. The comparison the Senator from Utah just made is invalid. He is talking about sugar and I am talking about a physical piece of real estate, and the reason that real estate is successful is that we use it to the tune of a third of the entire operation.

That is where the inference was made that seemed to me an insult to the Panamanian people. The Panamanian people are just as smart as we are. They want to make some money and have some revenue. Why would they not keep the canal open? Why would they intentionally tell their largest customer, their largest source of revenue, "You can't use the canal?"

Forget the Alaskan oil, forget the wheat, forget the coal. A person would have to be really dumb, and that is what we are really saying: "You people are not very smart, because the first thing you are going to do when we give you the canal is tell us we cannot use it and cut off your revenue."

I assume that if somebody is going to have a capital resource which would make him money, that person would want to make some money. I cannot conceive that somebody would want to throw money away. It happens. I have seen it happen in this country, and it may well happen in Panama someday, because they are just like us. They are capable of making mistakes.

But it strikes me as odd, the scenario that my colleague is building up and that the radical conservatives in this country are building up, that these Panamanian people are so inferior that they will not be intelligent enough to make a buck.

Mr. HATCH. I think I made it clear before that I have never said the Panamanian people were inferior, and the inference is not well founded.

Mr. GRAVEL. If I can clarify that, because I do not want to attribute anything to my colleague that is not accurate——

Mr. HATCH. I would not think so.

Mr. GRAVEL. I have come to the conclusion that you are insulting the people of Panama when you are telling them they are not intelligent enough to make money like we are.

Mr. HATCH. Let me answer that.

I understand, also, that a part of the argument of the Senator from Alaska has been that the Panamanian people, irrespective of how equal they are to any other nation in the world in intelligence, and so forth, and I suggest that they are——

Mr. GRAVEL. That they are?

Mr. HATCH. That they are just as capable as anybody else.

Mr. GRAVEL. I appreciate that, for the record, and I will rest upon that.

Mr. HATCH. I think it is important to dispel another problem that the Senator from Alaska brought up.

However, before I get to that, the Senator acts like there is no Russian interest in Panama at all. The Senator is aware that the Russians were there right before these treaties were written?

Mr. GRAVEL. Were what?

Mr. HATCH. They were in Panama.

Mr. GRAVEL. Doing what?

Mr. HATCH. From July 11 through July 30.

Mr. GRAVEL. Oh, the Russians.

Mr. HATCH. The "trade delegation."

Mr. GRAVEL. I did not realize that. Was that the same delegation that was in the Senate here, in room 208, where we had meetings with them for 2 days? Was that the same Russian delegation negotiating with you and me?

Mr. HATCH. No.

Mr. GRAVEL. Oh, it is a different Russian delegation.

Mr. HATCH. You do not know that the Russians were there? Everybody else does. I wonder why you do not.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not follow everybody's itinerary.

Mr. HATCH. Do you understand why they were there?

Mr. GRAVEL. I was a little confused that it might be the same delegation that was negotiating with us.

Mr. HATCH. Not at all. But do you know why they were there?

Mr. GRAVEL. No. Why were they there?

Mr. HATCH. You do not know?

Mr. GRAVEL. No.

Mr. HATCH. And you are arguing that there is no Russian interest in Panama?

Mr. GRAVEL. I did not say that.

Mr. HATCH. I hope you did not say that.

Mr. GRAVEL. And I would hope the Russians would be smart enough to want to continue using the canal.

Mr. HATCH. They were there for six basic reasons.

Mr. GRAVEL. What were they?

Mr. HATCH. No. 1, to negotiate to build a heavy-duty equipment plant.

Mr. GRAVEL. Would that not be a good thing for Panama?

Mr. HATCH. It may or may not be. No. 2——

Mr. GRAVEL. You say, "may or may not be?"

Mr. HATCH. Has it been a good thing for them to do that in Europe?

Mr. GRAVEL. If it is economically advantageous to the Panamanians, would you have any objection to the Russians doing that?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. GRAVEL. Why?

Mr. HATCH. Because of the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. GRAVEL. They build Caterpillar trucks.

Mr. HATCH. Just like the Comar River plant, where they built the mobile missile which was financed by American dollars, under the guise that they were going to build Caterpillar tractors and trucks.

Mr. GRAVEL. You say the Russian trade mission was there talking about tractors but it is really missiles they were negotiating?

Mr. HATCH. There may be some truth to that.

No. 2, they were there to build a hydroelectric powerplant.

Mr. GRAVEL. Would there be something wrong about the Russian financing a hydroelectric powerplant in Panama?

Mr. HATCH. There could be.

Mr. GRAVEL. What?

Mr. HATCH. There could be.

Mr. GRAVEL. I would like to know what it could be.

Mr. HATCH. Because I do not want a Russian presence established in the center of our intelligence-gathering activities in this hemisphere, as you know and everybody else knows.

Mr. GRAVEL. You are telling me that if the Soviets want to help the Panamanians build a hydroelectric dam to make some electricity, and they are prepared to give them more favorable economic benefits than the United States is prepared to, you object to their taking economic advantage in principle?

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

No. 3—

Mr. GRAVEL. How would you feel—

Mr. HATCH. Do you not object to the Russians being there and establishing a presence?

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not object to the Russians being there, any more than when they were in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. HATCH. But establishing a presence there.

Mr. GRAVEL. Wait a minute. What are you trying to do, pin me as a Communist or something?

Mr. HATCH. No.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Russians were here. I met with them in meetings, and so did the leadership of the Senate, and you are saying there is something wrong with talking to the Russians. The only way we are going to get world peace is talking to them.

Why would you be against a Panamanian citizen being able to buy electricity cheaper because it is from a Russian-made generator rather than if it were an American-made generator?

Mr. HATCH. I would not have any objection to that.

Mr. GRAVEL. How would you feel if another country said that you cannot trade in principal with another country because of their ideology and you cannot take economic advantage? How do you stand here and talk about the fact that we get chrome from the Soviet Union that goes on the bumpers of your car, and it does not bother you at all?

Mr. HATCH. And they get what from us.

Mr. GRAVEL. And you will not let the Panamanian citizens buy cheap electricity from a Russian generator. Shame all over you. Now you see why we get a reputation of Yankee imperialists. We cannot even let these poor people buy economic goods wherever they want to.

Mr. HATCH. Will you let me give you the six reasons? Then we can argue them.

Mr. GRAVEL. You only got to two reasons.

Mr. HATCH. Let me go through the reasons, and then we will debate them. I think that, as a composite, they have a lot to do with what is going on in Panama today.

I might mention that everybody knows that détente means we give the Russians wheat and they give us the Russian flu. That is about the way things work.

Let me go through all six reasons.

Mr. GRAVEL. But, besides, there is one thing that my colleague has molded into his reasoning which I think has to be cleared up before he finishes his six reasons.

Would you think the Panamanians would be entitled to the same rights and relationships that we Americans have with the Soviet Union?

Mr. HATCH. We can assume so.

Mr. GRAVEL. Then having a mission go there like a mission coming to the United States is about the same thing.

Mr. HATCH. Is it?

Mr. GRAVEL. Well, my colleague also——

Mr. HATCH. How can the Senator argue that?

Mr. GRAVEL. I wonder if the American people know that there is not even a diplomatic relationship between those two countries, between Panama and the Soviet Union. They do not exchange embassies, I mean they are not even at the level we are of contact with the Communists.

Mr. HATCH. Let me get it straight.

Mr. GRAVEL. So when the Senator said a minute ago that he thinks it is OK for the Panamanians to have the same level of contact that we have, they do not have the same level, and so I do not know the point the Senator is making with his six points over this trade delegation, which is clearly a trade delegation.

Mr. HATCH. Let me make the six points.

Mr. GRAVEL. I would like to hear the rest of the points the Senator wants to make.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator. Let me make the six points and then we will be glad to debate them. Let me start from the beginning again and make all of the points without interruption, if we can, and then I shall be happy to discuss them.

No. 1 was to establish a heavy duty equipment plant; No. 2 was to establish a hydroelectric plant; No. 3 was to establish a Russian bank; No. 4——

Mr. GRAVEL. What was No. 3?

Mr. HATCH. To establish a Russian bank.

No. 4 was to acquire the right——

[Mr. Hodges assumed the chair.]

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Romano Romani and Larry Ritt, of my staff, be permitted the privileges of the floor during debate and votes on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator from Utah for yielding.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is welcome.

No. 4 was to acquire the rights to the old France World War I Air Force base right outside of the city of Colon. No. 5 was to establish a——

Mr. GRAVEL. Wait a second. France had a——

Mr. HATCH. No.

Mr. GRAVEL. First World War air base?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is not aware of the old France World War I Air Force base we established there?

Mr. GRAVEL. No.

Mr. HATCH. I am surprised. Might I add I am not surprised. No. 5.

Mr. GRAVEL. Wait a second, please. I am not aware that France had an air field.

Mr. HATCH. They did not.

Mr. GRAVEL. What is the Senator saying?

Mr. HATCH. It was called the old France World War I Air Force base.

Mr. GRAVEL. And the Russians want it?

Mr. HATCH. They want to acquire that.

No. 5, they want to establish a propaganda network.

Mr. GRAVEL. What?

Mr. HATCH. Establish a propaganda network, with their top propagandists.

Mr. GRAVEL. Does the Senator have the biography so that he knows he is the top one?

Mr. HATCH. Wait until I finish and then make the debate. I wish to make these points and the Senator can then ask questions.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am having great difficulty controlling my zeal, and I think my colleague shares the same zeal I do.

Mr. HATCH. I understand.

Let me just say this. We are both on opposite sides of this thing, but off the floor we are good friends and we are both very zealous for our respective causes.

No. 6, they want to purchase 50,000 metric tons of raw sugar at double the world price, at two times the world price. I have to ask why are they doing these things? Why would they want to pay double the world price during a sugar glut for Panamanian sugar?

Mr. GRAVEL. Look.

Mr. HATCH. Let me finish.

What I would like to say is this: Anybody who believes that the Russians do not want to establish a presence down there, do not want to interfere with our use of the Panama Canal, and have not backed up the Cubans in building the biggest embassy down there, has not been studying this particular problem. Anybody who says that the Russians should have all the rights in the world to do what I have suggested I think is wrong.

I must leave the floor, but let me just say this in conclusion.

Mr. GRAVEL. Do not leave until I have a chance to respond.

Mr. HATCH. I will be happy to have the Senator respond, and I said this earlier in the debate. Frankly, since the distinguished Senator from Alaska has not heard about the Russian delegation in Panama, I wonder how widely disseminated these facts really are. But those of use who studied it know this is what is happening. The State Department knows this. They have admitted it to me. The ambassadors have admitted it. Even the President has admitted it except in public. I cannot understand why these things are not brought up publicly. I cannot understand why the distinguished Senator from Alaska, who made such a thorough study of this has not heard of these things.

Mr. GRAVEL. If I could just respond, first off, I do not monitor the trips of foreign delegations all over the world, much less Panama.

We had a delegation of the leadership of the Soviet Union come to the Senate of the United States, and less than 100 feet from this spot in that other room there we sat and negotiated with these people about human rights, about economic matters, and about defense matters. Does this mean we are un-American? Does that mean we are not to be trusted? But, of course, if a Panamanian talks to a Communist, it is going to close the canal. I mean, what kind of convoluted logic brings the Senator to that kind of conclusion? I would even go so far as to say this—

Mr. HATCH. Study of world affairs.

Mr. GRAVEL. If the Soviet Union sent a delegation to Panama to buy sugar at two times the world price, I will pay the psychiatric bill of the idiot who will not sell it to him.

Mr. HATCH. Who are the idiots who are allowing it to be done?

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know where the Senator got the figure that the Soviets are prepared to pay the Panamanians twice the world price.

Mr. HATCH. Right out of the Panamanian Embassy.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not want to insult some of my Russian acquaintances by dignifying it too much. But if the Senator is right—and I do not know where he got his information—I hope he will bring it forth and put it in the Record, and I hope if there was an agreement made down there he will bring that forward and put it in the Record so that we can see what the price of sugar is for people who are dumb enough to pay.

There is a world price of sugar, and I do not think the Soviet Union went to Panama and offered twice the world price, particularly when Panama has an overproduction and there is an overproduction of sugar in the world today. In fact, the market is extremely depressed.

Maybe my colleague from Hawaii, who has just come on the floor, might tell us a little bit about the market situation of sugar. I do not know. I am not very knowledgeable. We do not grow much sugar in Alaska. But I do know that there is an overabundance of it. And my colleague links the possible closure of the Panama Canal with the fact that the Soviet Union is prepared, or at least he says is prepared, to pay twice the world price of sugar. That is the way he presents it here, the way it is presented to us and to the American public over these airways. It is suggested that because the Panamanians entertained a trade delegation from the Soviet Union that this makes them suspect, that we cannot trust them, there is something wrong with these people, and obviously these people cannot be trusted to give them back their proper due operation of the Panama Canal.

That is a very, very convoluted reasoning because we deal with the Soviet Union all the time. We deal a lot more with the Soviet Union than do ever the Panamanians and will ever the Panamanians deal with the Soviet Union.

So does that mean that our Government, the President of the United States, the Senate of the United States, the Members of the House of Representatives, who have traveled to the Soviet Union, cannot be trusted? Can one imagine what the Senator from Utah would be saying here on the floor of the U.S. Senate had Gen. Omar Torrijos had the temerity to go to Moscow? The general traveled around Europe. He went to visit the Arab world. He went to visit Israel. Just imagine had General Torrijos been to Moscow. We would be hearing on the floor of the U.S. Senate right now that obviously he has concluded some secret deal with the Communists that are going to bring him in.

This is preposterous, absolutely preposterous, and when the American people can perceptively wade through a lot of the garbage that is put out, they will be able to realize that, so what? So there has been a trade negotiation between the Government of Panama, a sovereign nation, and the Government of the Soviet Union, a sovereign people. There is nothing wrong with that.

I hope they have a lot of trade delegations go down there. I hope they have a lot of these trade delegations from the Soviet Union come to the United States.

There is only one way we are going to have world peace. It is by living together and working together, and there is only one way we are going to live together and work together and that is by talking to each other, start trading with each other. If the Soviet Union can go to Panama and built a heavy equipment repair facility cheaper than we Americans can do it then, boy, let them go do it, and maybe next time our private area will shape up.

But I do not think that is the case. I do not think that the Soviet Union can beat us economically in any one place in the world. Our free enterprise system is the most successful system in the world, and we can overpower anybody at will with our economic might. All we have to do is focus on the problem and so if we have a problem in Panama I submit it is not because a trade delegation from the Soviet Union went there. It is a problem of our own making and that problem perpetuates itself in the kind of debate we have here.

That problem perpetuates itself in the kind of debate, we have here, because it is implied that there is something wrong with a Panamanian talking to some foreign nation.

We can talk to anybody in the world; why cannot they? Who do we think we are? Who do we think we are, that we can say that because Mr. Torrijos, the head of the government, talks to a Communist talks to a Russian, that that is something wrong with him. We do it all the time.

When people make that kind of argument, I think they do us a disservice, a great disservice, and the inference, of course, is that these people of Panama cannot act like normal citizens, like anyone else.

That is what is so characteristic of the problem as we perceive the Panama Canal situation, that we have some unique situation there where these people in Panama are not entitled to realize their normal human aspirations, that they should not be able to enjoy their sovereignty like anyone else; that because we are in bed with them, there is something wrong in that.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I wish to commend the Senator from Alaska for the keen observation he has made relative to human relations, which form the basis of international relations.

Inasmuch as the Senator mentioned Hawaii and sugar, I would like to state that if the Soviet Union is willing to pay double the market price for sugar, Hawaii will be more than willing to sell that sugar to the Soviet Union.

When I was in Panama with the distinguished majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) and five other Senators, I had occasion to discuss the matter of sugar with General Torrijos, and he was very much concerned about the surplus of sugar he had in his country. I think, if I recall the figure correctly, he said that he was running to as much as 200,000 tons of expected surplus by the end of this year, if the price of sugar did not go up and if the surplus did not go down.

Heavens, we are trying to help Panama now to be able to stand up economically on its own feet. If the Soviet Union is willing to pay double the market price to Panama for that surplus sugar, let the Soviet Union do it.

Mr. GRAVEL. But—

Mr. MATSUNAGA. It would not only help Panama, it would help us to get rid of some of that surplus sugar from the world market, and it would definitely help Hawaii.

Mr. GRAVEL. But the inference here of our colleague from Utah (Mr. Hatch) was that if the Panamanian people dare sell sugar to the Soviet Union for twice the world market price, that could cause them to not be qualified to handle the Panama Canal, because obviously that would make them fellow Communists, and therefore we should oppose the Panama Canal treaties and ruin their communism.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I was very much concerned about the allegation that General Torrijos, the recognized leader of Panama, was a Communist. Well, last November, the seven of us, Members of the Senate who were there, made this a major inquiry on our part. When we put the question directly to General Torrijos whether he was a Communist or not, he was very much disturbed, in fact insulted, to the point where he said he felt as though we had asked him the question whether he was a fairy, realizing how much he and his people think of manhood there.

Then I myself put the question to him, "It is said by the opponents," I said to him, "that if the U.S. Senate should ratify the treaties, you will then turn over control of the canal, after you get control of it, to the Cubans or the Russians or some other Communist nation."

His response was, "I don't want Panamanian waters infested by Communist sharks."

We went further, and pointedly made an issue of this question of whether he was a Communist or not, and he said, "If I tried to lead my people to communism, they would oust me from office," or words to that effect. "And if, despite my leadership," he said, "my people would take up communism, I would then leave this country."

That is how strongly he feels. I am convinced that if anything, he is pro-American. He is American-educated, as the Senator from Alaska well knows.

When we talked to Americans living both in the zone and outside of the zone in Panama proper, and when we questioned them about what they thought about Torrijos' political leanings, and we talked to Panamanians as well, those who voted for the treaty and those who voted against the treaty, to college students and to Panamanian leaders in business and in government, not a single one—I repeat, not a single one of them—thought that Torrijos was a Communist.

Now, how can we insist on this floor, after all that testimony—President Demetrio Lakas of Panama went so far as to say that he would stake his life on it that Torrijos was not a Communist—now, how can the opponents keep insinuating on this floor that we cannot deal with Panama because its leader now is a Communist or has Communist leanings, or he may well turn to the Soviet Union or Cuba for leadership upon the United States Senate ratifying the treaties now pending in this body?

That, to me, is beyond comprehension, unless, of course, they are just trying to convince themselves that they ought to stand pat against the ratification of the treaties.

I thank the Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) for yielding. I have been listening to the radio also, and I must commend him for the tremendous job that he did this morning and is now continuing to do to rebut the statements being made by the opposition.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my good friend from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga). We share a lot of unique problems, since both our States are noncontiguous.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I will be happy to yield in one moment.

Mr. HELMS. I wanted to ask the Senator from Hawaii one question.

Mr. GRAVEL. Fine, but I just want to place something in the Record. It is a statement by Ambassador Jorden on the Panama Canal treaties before the Foreign Relations Committee. It is on page 286. I quote Ambassador Jorden.

In the first place, I have come to know General Torrijos very well—

This is on the subject of Torrijos and the Communists, and I am quoting Ambassador Jorden:

In the first place, I have come to know General Torrijos very well over the last 3½ years. I have spent a lot of time with him traveling around the country and in the capital.

I guess at this point I know him about as well as any American. I can assure you that he is not a Communist. He is a man deeply dedicated to his country and to the improvement of his people's conditions. He has insisted on great improvements in education, health care, and particularly for those people in the countryside who in the past have never had much opportunity for an education or for much health."

To continue, this is the American Ambassador.

Just as a footnote, let me point out that as captain in the national guard he was rounding up a group of left-wing guerrillas and was shot by the Communists. It is very hard for me to believe that a man who has been shot by the Communists can become a convinced member of the organization. In any case, all one needs to do is to talk to the man at great length, see what he has done, see what the impulse is in his government to quickly recognize that he is not a Communist and does not approve of the Communist system.

I would only add to that, in our great American tradition, and in normal human experience, we judge people by their friends. We may not know a guy. We may say, "Well, I do not know him very well. I only met him once or twice, but who are his friends? Who does he associate with?"

That is a key thing with Torrijos. Who are his friends? That is the question.

At the crucial moment of negotiating the treaties with the United States, just a week before the treaties were really completed in negotiations, what did he do? He asked for a meeting in Bogota—this was in July—he asked for a meeting of his friends, the people from whom he takes counsel. He asked to sit down with them and show them what was going on in negotiations so he could get their views.

Who were his friends? Who showed up at the meeting in Bogota? The President of Jamaica, an official elected by the people. Mr. Carlos Andres Perez, the President of Venezuela. Then we have Mr. Lopez Michelsen, duly elected by the people of Columbia, and we have Mr. Daniel Oduber, duly elected by the people of Costa Rica, a great little democracy.

These are the people he sat down with at a table and said, "Friends, let us talk about this treaty I am negotiating with the United States. Give me your advice so I can decide if this is the right thing I am doing." Those were his friends.

After that meeting is when the treaty was concluded.

I think Americans can understand that. If there is someone you do not know very well, you can ask simply, "Who are his friends in a crunch? Who does he rely upon?"

In the case of Omar Torrijos, the person who has been vilified extensively on this floor, unfortunately, his friends are all the leaders of the great democracies of Central and South America.

That is how you judge the man.

I am happy to yield to my colleagues from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I do not want to go into solitudes for Torrijos. I will leave that to others.

Mr. GRAVEL. I was only giving facts.

Mr. HELMS. Well, maybe the Senator was.

I was intrigued by the statement of the Senator from Hawaii, who said something to the effect that, as the distinguished Senator from Alaska well knows, Torrijos was educated in the United States. Will the Senator tell me where he was educated in the United States?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I will be happy to, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. GRAVEL. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. In December 1959, General Torrijos attended the Junior War College, Fort Sherman, Canal Zone. In June of 1962 he attended the Counter-Insurgency Orientation Course at the U.S. Army Caribbean School, Fort Gulick, Canal Zone. In July 1964 he was a student, Senior Officer Preventative Maintenance Course at the U.S. Army School of the Americas, Fort Gulick, Canal Zone. From March to December of 1966 he was again a student of the Army Command and General Staff Course, School of the Americas, Fort Gulick, Canal Zone, which, as the Senator from South Carolina said, claims to be American territory.

Mr. HELMS. General Torrijos will be dismayed to hear the Senator from Hawaii describing that as U.S. territory. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. I again want to point out to my distinguished colleague from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga), I would be very distressed as a taxpayer that we would spend all of this money educating a person who was a Communist. It would bother me no end. I am glad he has great proximity to the views of the American military.

Obviously, friends in life are made in military institutions. I would hope that the benefit would be that General Torrijos would be affected that way. The military people I have talked with in the Panama Canal Zone, General McAuliffe and others, feel he is very close. General Brown considers him a friend. Imagine that. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has a personal and high regard for General Torrijos. That is not the Soviet Union chief of staff but the American Chief of Staff. He went to school with him and he taught him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I do not associate General Torrijos with the Communist Party. That has no bearing on my decision. However, as a U.S. Senator, I would not be surprised even if he were a Communist if my Government would be interested in doing business with him. We recognize Russia and we want to recognize Red China. We recognize as many Communist countries as we recognize free countries. If Torrijos were a Communist, and I do not think he is, it would not surprise me that my Government would like to get in bed with another Communist. We bundle very well.

Mr. GRAVEL. If I might comment, my colleague should have been here debating the Senator from Utah rather than I. I am sure he could answer much better than I.

I will ask my colleague from Arizona, why is he convinced that Torrijos is not a Communist? Many allegations have been made and inferences made that he is, by people on this floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think that there are Communists in his organization, just as there are such people in our own Government. But the fact that he has graduated from our military courses and graduated from the War College, all of which require the same attention as when we entered military service, he may or may not have been interested. He did not impress me as being a Communist. I did not feel it necessary to question him about it. He is a gentleman who is interested in the welfare of his country. I do not doubt that. Those are not my reasons for opposing the treaty at all.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would be happy to yield.

I thank my colleague from Arizona and I yield to my colleague from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank my colleague.

I would only like to present a few comments. The Senator has been making a very forceful and effective speech. I could not help but take note of the naivete of Senators who give words of praise to a dictator in charge of a dictatorial regime which does not respect human rights. I wonder if the distinguished Senator would see any parallel between this praise of dictator Torrijos and the praise and adulation heaped on Fidel Castro when he was seeking to overthrow Batista in Cuba, the great praise that was heaped upon him as a land reformer, and the support which was given to him by the media in this country, when all the while he was a Communist at heart as he showed very soon after he came into office.

I am wondering, too, if the distinguished Senator sees any parallel in the praise that he heaps on Torrijos and the fact that—

Mr. GRAVEL. Will my colleague let me correct him? I do not recall in the last hour that I have had the floor heaping any praise on Torrijos.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator can be judged whether he praised him or not, but that was the effect of the Senator's comments as I heard them.

Mr. GRAVEL. If praise is saying that a person is not a Communist, then, of course, we have heaped such praise on Mr. Torrijos. And perhaps the Senator from Arizona, the distinguished Senator (Mr. Goldwater), has been heaping praise on him.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not phrased my question. I was going to ask the Senator if he saw any parallel between the praise which is or is not being heaped upon him by the distinguished Senator with the support that the industrialists gave that dictator in the early days of his seeking to come to power.

I am somewhat taken back by the naivete of the distinguished Senator from Alaska and the distinguished Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) yield, inasmuch as the Senator from Hawaii has been mentioned and been accused of heaping praise upon a dictator?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I want to make it clear to the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) that I am as much opposed to dictators as he is. The issue which was brought up was whether or not General Torrijos is a Communist. I joined the Senator from Alaska, and the Senator from Arizona even joined us, in stating that, in our view, General Torrijos is not a Communist. I spent, as the Senator from Alabama well knows, 4 days in Panama with the distinguished majority leader and five other Senators in personal contact, not only with the general himself but with people who know him, people who live in Panama. Through interviews with these people who know him, people who ought to know whether or not General Torrijos is a Communist, I personally became convinced that General Torrijos is not a Communist.

If that be heaping praise upon the general, I say, I am convinced to the very end of my life that the Senator from Alabama is not a Communist. That is only a statement, not praise.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for that remark.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I do not even know whether the Senator from Alabama is concerned that I heap praise upon him, but I have admired the way he has held the fort here for the opposition, although I think he is misguided in offering his latest amendments. I am sure the majority of the Members of this body will go along with the distinguished majority leader and the rest of us in voting down his amendment, because that amendment which the Senator from Alabama has offered goes to the very heart of the treaty. If his amendment is accepted, then there will be no treaty. For that reason, I am opposing the Senator's amendment.

I thank the Senator from Alaska for yielding.

Mr. GRAVEL. I shall be happy to yield additionally.

I do want to pick up on the statement made by my distinguished colleague from Alabama. He is very clever in how he presents his logic—first, that we are praising Torrijos. That is not the case. I think there may be areas, and I know of areas, where he should be praised. That is not what we are talking about here.

What we were talking about was the opening of the colloquy that started with Senator Hatch, of Utah, about communism in Panama and the inference that Omar Torrijos is a Communist and, for that reason, we should stop the treaties and take the position that my colleague from Alabama holds and some other colleagues hold.

None other than the Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater), who is knowledgeable in this area, stepped forward to say that, in his best judgment, Mr. Torrijos is not a Communist.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was forced to make my statement, because I very well recall both the senior and junior Senators from New York very eloquently explaining to the Senate that whatever a dictator or a leader of the country is is not the issue. They feel that it makes no difference if Torrijos is in the narcotics business. I assume it would make no difference to them if he were a Communist; the treaty has to be judged on the merits of the treaty.

I wish I had been here when the Senator from Utah started to speak, because I feel that both Senators from New York have made a very good point, that we have done business throughout our history, since the days of Thomas Jefferson, with countries of ill repute, with leaders of ill repute, and they have done business with the United States, at times when our heads could not be held high.

I still repeat that I am a rather old-fashioned fellow. I like to know with whom I am doing business. If it is proven that he is a Communist, that will just make more strong my opposition to this worthless treaty.

Mr. GRAVEL. Another person who joins the Senator from Arizona is John Wayne. I would like to quote from his statement.

There will always be accusations and counteraccusations in this area. General Torrijos has never followed the Marxist line.

That is John Wayne.

I would like to add to this bevy of gentlemen William Buckley, from an article in the Star of December 4, 1977, quoting the last paragraph:

The desire of the Panamanians for sovereignty over the spinal column of their country is as genuine whether they are tyrannized over by Torrijos or led gently by Pericles. If we are determined to mistrust everyone—the President, the military, the Senate—what use is a canal to us?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. This is just a little comment.

I well recall, during the Presidential campaign 2 years ago, when I chastised my old and dear friend, Ronald Reagan, for, in effect, declaring war against Panama in many of his statements prior to his seeking the nomination, I received a 6-page letter from my very, very old friend, John Wayne, giving me pluperfect hell. In fact, he typed it himself and he is a worse typewriter operator than I am.

A little while ago, he came out for the treaty, so I mailed the 6-page letter back and asked him to explain it. I have since spoken to him. He has good reasons.

Strangely, just today, I have a letter from Bill Buckley, and we have not talked about this treaty at all. He complained that we had not had time. Two of the major points I had been making he agrees with. However, he disagrees with what I call the banking issue, or how much do the big banks of this country really have to do with the treaty? I intend to go back to my office, if I have time, and either write him or call him and explain that.

I think the big thing about the Buckley switchover was that the Archbishop of Panama was one of the most persuasive men I have ever run into, a very attractive fellow, and I had to sit there with my armor fully well developed in order to keep from yielding to him.

I am glad the Senator brought the subject up, because it gave me an opportunity to make that comment.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Senator from Alabama, in his statement, raised the question of human rights. I would like to pose a question to my good friend from Alabama.

There is one organization that I know of, called Amnesty International, that generally goes around the world investigating human rights. The other in this hemisphere is the OAS, the Organization of American States. Does my colleague know of any report in which Panama has been chastised or been reported by these two organizations about its civil rights abuse since General Torrijos has been in office?

Mr. ALLEN. I know nothing of the organizations to which the Senator referred, as to their rating of Dictator Torrijos and his regime. I do know that Dictator Torrijos came to power as a result of a coup d'etat, that they have not had a free election in Panama in almost 10 years.

I do know that civil rights there are not respected. I do know that there are numerous political prisoners in the jails in Panama.

I do know that free expression is not permitted there and that strict censorship is maintained.

One organization, possibly it was one of the very ones to which the distinguished Senator from Alaska referred, rating various countries around the globe on their record on human rights on a scale of from one to seven—one being the best and seven being the worst—rated Panama six in that category.

I hope the distinguished Senator is not suggesting that the dictator has a good track record on civil rights or human rights. Possibly, he has been taken in, shall I say, or deluded by Dictator Torrijos' agreement, which he announced to a number of the 50-odd Senators who went down to Panama to visit the dictator, that he is going to start doing better.

I do not know in what way he promised to do better, but anyone that would believe that, I believe, would believe anything.

I hope I have properly and accurately answered the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague from Alabama who just made some remarks. Let us put up a little bit of proof here.

He says there was no free election. They had one last October when they had a plebiscite on the treaties.

Mr. ALLEN. That was hardly an election. That was a referendum or a plebiscite.

An election is a decision of the people as to the public officials who shall represent them. That is what an election is.

A plebiscite or a referendum is not an election.

Now, when they start having elections to choose their duly chosen representatives in government, then they will start having free elections, if, in fact, they are free.

Mr. GRAVEL. Does my colleague know what percentage of countries in the world do not have free election as he defines them?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I do not know that.

Mr. GRAVEL. A close guess?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know that is important to this issue. I do not have that statistic.

If the Senator has it, it might be interesting to put it in the Record. I do not have anything.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. My colleague also made the statement of human rights, abolishing human rights.

What organization is he quoting—from whose figures? I do not know if he went down there and visited all the jails and can ascertain that directly. If he has not, he has to be relying on hearsay or what somebody told him.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not have any actual knowledge of it because I have not been to Panama since 1943 when I went through the canal on a Navy vessel, an APA attack transport, as a member of the U.S. Navy. And I have not made any personal checks on the human rights conditions there at any time. Only, necessarily, I have to rely on research and information furnished by others.

The distinguished Senator from Alaska, having recently been in Panama, possibly could give the Senate more accurate information, or fuller information, about the dictator's denial of human rights there in Panama.

Mr. GRAVEL. I think the people within earshot of our voice expect a little more of us than to stand here and make gross statements of fact, and they expect us to back up our statements a little bit.

I just said earlier that Amnesty International, since Torrijos has been in power, has not rendered a negative report on him, nor has the OAS, the Organization of American States.

My colleague is saying there are gross violations of human rights by Mr. Torrijos. All I am asking for is somebody to put up a piece of paper that says some organization looked at it, and ask at least for a name to give the American people as to where this charge comes from.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand the distinguished Senator is saying that Dictator Torrijos has a good record on human rights in his dictatorial regime, is that the Senator's statement?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am sorry, I did not hear.

Mr. ALLEN. I just asked the Senator if he is stating to the Senate that Dictator Torrijos in his dictatorial regime there does, in fact, have a good record on human rights?

Mr. GRAVEL. Now, I think people can understand the English language the way we are talking about it right now.

I did not say that, I do not—

Mr. ALLEN. I am asking the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. [continuing]. Accept the twist in the colloquy like that.

My colleague stated very clearly there was gross violation of human rights. All I am asking is to put up a little bit of proof, just a little bit. Do not turn the question around saying I am giving the affirmative. I made my statements very clear. When I used a figure, I used it very precisely.

All I am asking is for my good friend from Alabama, if he says there is gross violation of human rights, we do not know if he picked it up down the corridor or in the men's room. All I want to say is that we are talking to the American public and somebody ought to put on paper here that Amnesty International has found anything gross. The Organization of American States has not found anything gross. The United Nations had an observer at the last election, or referendum, whichever you want to call it, and they found it a fair, open, democratic election.

If you want to make statements to the American people, some of us are going to stand up here and hold you accountable.

Now, put up the name of the organization that did the studies on human rights in Panama so that we can examine it.

Mr. ALLEN. I am asking the Senator to state if he states that Torrijos has a good record on human rights.

Mr. GRAVEL. Well, I would say that the Organization of American States and Amnesty International, particularly Amnesty International which—

Mr. ALLEN. What do they say? Put it in the Record.

Mr. GRAVEL. Amnesty International looked at Panama and did not come up with the accusations of gross civil rights.

Mr. ALLEN. What did they say?

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not have the report in front of me, but I am using—mind now, my colleague, what I am doing is using Amnesty International, if he wants to match me.

Mr. ALLEN. What is that?

Mr. GRAVEL. Come up with the name of an organization and then we will send our staffs out, researching what each other has said, and then come back tomorrow and assault each other with it.

I have put my stuff on the table; put up yours.

Mr. ALLEN. What have you put up?

Mr. GRAVEL. Where do you get your information of the gross human rights violations in Panama?

Mr. ALLEN. It is a matter of record. It is a matter of record.

Mr. GRAVEL. Give me the name of what the record is.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, if the Senator is arguing this dictator has a good record on human rights, I will certainly ask him to show that.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is not—

Mr. ALLEN. It does not show what they say. What do they say?

Mr. GRAVEL. What I am arguing, I am taking the Senator at his word. I know my colleague from Alabama is a man of his word. He just a few moments ago, said there were gross human rights violations in Panama by this Dictator Torrijos. All I am saying is, put up, put up your proof.

I would like to read a quote, just a quote from somebody who is close to the situation, Ambassador Jorden. This is on the human rights question during the hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee:

Ambassador JORDEN. I think that human rights is an issue that is a serious one in every country in Latin America. I think that the performance on human rights in Panama has been far better than most. There is no system of massive arrests or you don't have cases of people being picked up and disappearing. There is no calculated program of torture and inhumane treatment, although let me say candidly that there sometimes occurs rough treatment in jail but rough treatment in jail at the hands of an overenthusiastic policeman has been known to happen in a lot of places.

Sometimes in Alaska, and sometimes in Alabama also.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. I hope the Senator will put that—

Mr. GRAVEL. I just did. I read it very clearly into the record.

So I go back to my original point, my colleague asked me to yield so that he could ask me a question. In the phrasing of the question he made the statement that there is gross violation of human rights by the Dictator Torrijos.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. GRAVEL. All I am asking is for him to put up a little bit of proof for the American people, because they have been led down the primrose path on this thing—just a little.

Mr. ALLEN. I quoted the finding of an international body. I am not able to supply the name right now. I will do so before the day is over.

Mr. GRAVEL. I will accept it.

Mr. ALLEN. They gave Torrijos a rating of 6 on a scale from 1 to 7, 1 being a good record, 7 being a bad record.

If the distinguished Senator is saying that Torrijos has a good record on civil rights and human rights, I would like him to show us where any organization says that is correct, that they do have a good record in observing human rights.

Mr. GRAVEL. Do you know of any organization that has rated our treatment of the canal? Do you know of any organization that has done that—rated us?

Let me read a quotation that has been handed to me.

In 1977, Freedom House listed Panama as not free. Incidentally, Freedom House is for the treaties. They support the treaties. They listed Panama as not free and gave the Torrijos government a rating equal to Cuba in the suppression of—

Mr. ALLEN. Wait a minute. What the Senator says is the Panama is rated equal to Cuba in human rights?

Mr. GRAVEL. I did not say that.

Mr. ALLEN. What did the Senator say?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am reading from a document that is talking about Freedom House.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am not familiar with Freedom House. But this is the closest thing I could find to give you any kind of umbrage with respect to your statement.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator read that again, for the edification of the Senate?

Mr. GRAVEL. I think I read clearly enough. I am not a great reader, but I think I read clearly enough.

Does my colleague know who Freedom House is? I do not. Do you know who they are? I know who Amnesty International is. I know who the Organization of American States is. I know who the United Nations is. But I do not know who Freedom House is. I am prepared to give you a little help.

Mr. ALLEN. Yet, you are reading from it.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is right. I will take my chances.

Mr. ALLEN. Go ahead with it.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I yield.

Mr. LAXALT. I think you will find out that one of our colleagues, Senator Javits, I believe, is a member of the board of directors of Freedom House.

Mr. ALLEN. So the Senator says that Freedom House equates human rights in Panama with human rights in Cuba.

Mr. GRAVEL. In Cuba. On a scale of 1 being most free and 7 the least free, Panama was given a rating of 7 on political rights and 6 on civil rights.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAVEL. Chile has a rating of 7 and 5; Argentina, 6 and 5. In the rating of territories and dependencies, the Canal Zone is given a 5 and 3, the worst of any U.S. dependency or territory. I could go on.

If your staff wants to bother to look, I think you will find one of your sources is Freedom House and they back you up, but they also have rated the Canal Zone, and I do not think we have anything to be proud of.

If you want to be accusatory of Torrijos on one ground, you have to be accusatory to our conduct in the canal on the same ground.

So I say we should agree to the treaties so we can have a change in the situation.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for providing the evidence that the Senator from Alabama did not have beforehand.

From what he states, this organization, Freedom House—on which, according to the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt) the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. Javits) serves as a board member—in rating Mr. Torrijos' regime in Panama on political rights, I believe they say 6—or was that 7? On civil rights it is 6 and on political rights it is 7. Is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. If 7 is the bottom and Torrijos rates 7, would you not say that is a pretty bad record for political rights, and would you not think that 6 on a scale of 1 to 7 is a pretty bad record on civil rights?

The Senator has been kind enough to supply the omission that existed as to naming an organization that has been critical of human rights in Panama. I thank the Senator for supplying this information.

Mr. GRAVEL. I wanted to hasten and avoid having the Senator from Alabama do any undue research to find out what is backing up his statement.

Mr. ALLEN. I appreciate that.

Mr. GRAVEL. So often we stand on the floor and make statements that are not backed up.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a release from Freedom House Organization, the same one that gave this rating, that urges passage of the treaties.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

FREEDOM HOUSE URGES APPROVAL OF CANAL TREATIES DESPITE PANAMA'S
"DEPLORABLE" HUMAN RIGHTS RECORD

NEW YORK, November 17.—John Richardson, Jr., president of Freedom House, today released a board advisory calling upon the United States Senate to ratify the Panama Canal treaties, despite "the deplorable record on human rights of the present regime in Panama." Ratification, said the human rights group, "would best protect American interests and maintain the security of the Canal."

The organization released a 1,000-word analysis and advisory on the treaties. "This advisory was approved by the Board of Trustees of Freedom House after extensive study and review, and an overwhelmingly favorable vote," declared Mr. Richardson. "Expressing their views to their colleagues on our board were some of the principal supporters and an opponent of the treaties," said Mr. Richardson, until January an assistant secretary of state.

"Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security advisor to President Carter, on leave from our board, expressed his views to us, as did Gale McGee, U.S. ambassador to the Organization of American States. Both supported the treaties. We also received an extensive opposition memorandum from our colleague, Karl R. Bendtsen, former under secretary of the army and chairman of the Panama Canal Company, which presently controls the canal zone," Mr. Richardson added.

The advisory said that if the treaties are not ratified, "the immediate winners will be the communist parties of Latin America and the Caribbean, and Marxist regimes throughout the Third World." The cry of "Yankee imperialism" would be raised again, Freedom House predicted. It noted that "South American communists as well as North American conservatives oppose the treaties."

The organization declared that the "proclaimed U.S. concern for human rights will have been disavowed by our refusing to restore rights in the canal area to the sovereign."

Freedom House acknowledged that it is supporting the treaties despite the organization's "frequent analyses and reporting of the deplorable record on human rights of the present regime in Panama." The organization conducts year-round surveys of human rights in every country. Its latest finding reveals a "recent improvement attributable to the national referendum on the treaties." Freedom House concluded, however, that "the level of political rights and civil liberties in Panama is still low."

The advisory added that "most Panamanian governments, however, regardless of ideology or political or civil practices, have sought a new treaty with the United States." In considering ratification, the United States does not now face "a real choice," if it is "to recognize the severe losses we would almost certainly suffer from rejecting thirteen years of responsible negotiations by both Panama and the United States."

The advisory said that by ratifying the treaties "we will demonstrate that we not only support a higher world order based on the advancement of human rights and collaborative international agreements, but that we act on those moral commitments."

This action, the statement continued, would "also demonstrate that a major power can negotiate as an equal with a smaller nation, yield to the latter those rights which were inherently its own, and yet retain for the large power the fundamental advantages which it is in their mutual interest to reinforce."

The treaties, signed by President Carter and Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos, have been approved by a national referendum in Panama but must be ratified, presumably in January, by two-thirds of the U.S. Senate.

Under the treaties, Panama would immediately share control of Canal Zone facilities and services. The U.S. would have primary responsibility to protect the Canal until the year 2000. After that, the U.S. would indefinitely have the right to defend the Canal's neutrality, with "expeditious" use of the waterway assured.

The organization maintained that the United States "is not yielding what it owns, as would be the case with Alaska or Louisiana." The government of Panama "has been the sovereign over the Canal and the surrounding zone" since 1903, said the statement.

A FREEDOM HOUSE ADVISORY—IN SUPPORT OF PROMPT RATIFICATION OF THE TREATIES RELATING TO THE PANAMA CANAL

THE RELEVANT HISTORY

Since the United States built the Panama Canal in 1903 the government of Panama has been the sovereign—over the Canal and the surrounding zone. Under terms of the earlier treaty, the Canal Zone and the waterway became "territory of the Republic of Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States." The U.S. Supreme Court in 1948 described the Canal Zone as "territory over which we do not have sovereignty."

The United States, therefore, is not yielding what it owns—as would be the case with Alaska or Louisiana. Instead, this country in a mature, indeed wise decision in 1964—since renewed by three successive administrations—recognized that policies acceptable for a major power at the turn of the century were no longer defensible, morally or even militarily.

THE SECURITY OF THE CANAL

The present status of the Canal increasingly has generated disapproval throughout Latin America and the Caribbean. The Canal has become the focal point of political attacks and, fourteen years ago, anti-U.S. riots which resulted in the death of 20 Panamanians and four Americans. Negotiations culminating in the present treaties began shortly thereafter, and there has been relative calm since the treaty talks opened. Some attacks on the American presence may have been exacerbated and exploited by foreign or domestic communists. Antipathy to the American presence, however, was rooted in incontrovertible facts:

1. Panamanians long resented the splitting of their country in two, and the carving out of 550 square miles on which to maintain a foreign enclave.

2. No Panamanian ever signed the 1903 treaty.

3. Under that treaty, in exercising U.S. jurisdiction in the Canal Zone, the U.S. operates the schools, courts, prisons, and police force.

4. Though the tide of anti-U.S. feeling has ebbed and flowed throughout Latin America and the Caribbean, the Canal has always been a symbol of North American intrusion into the sovereignty and affairs of southern America.

By the manner in which the U.S. secured and retained control of the area, the considerable technological and medical achievements of the U.S. in constructing and operating the Canal have been overshadowed. We continue to perform a great service to the international maritime and trading communities. That service should not be diminished by anachronistic political arrangements.

For indeed the old political arrangements, continuing into this era, serve to undermine rather than bolster the security essential to the protection of the Canal.

There have been negotiated two agreements. The Panama Canal Treaty sets forth the terms for a new political relationship between Panama and the United States, and describes new operating procedures. For the remainder of this century, the U.S. shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal. After the year 2000, the second treaty—on the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal—will give the U.S. the right to continue to defend indefinitely the Canal's neutrality. The treaty also guarantees U.S. warships "expeditious" use of the waterway. Neutrality of the Canal—certainly in the best interest of America and of all maritime nations—is explicitly defined in the treaty. No limit is set on the means the U.S. can use to guarantee the Canal's neutrality. We are free to interpret unilaterally when the Canal's neutrality is violated or threatened.

WILL THE CANAL FUNCTION AS EFFICIENTLY?

The basic treaty provides for the training of Panamanian specialists and administrators. They would move into responsible positions and ultimately operate Canal installations. If both countries agree, a new sea-level canal or a third lane of locks may be constructed to expand the present facilities. Approximately $60-$70 million in revenues will be paid Panama at the onset. The proper, uninterrupted operation of the Canal is patently in Panama's national interest. Revenues from the Canal will become a mainstay of Panama's economy.

THE DANGERS OF NONRATIFICATION

Without question, if the present Canal treaties are not ratified by the U.S. Senate the immediate winners will be the communist parties of Latin America and the Caribbean, and the Marxist regimes throughout the Third World. The cry of "Yankee imperialism!" will once again be raised. Curiously, South American communists as well as North American conservatives oppose the treaties. The proclaimed U.S. concern for human rights will have been disavowed by our refusing to restore rights in the Canal area to the sovereign.

We support the ratification of the treaties despite Freedom House's frequent analysis and reporting of the deplorable record on human rights of the present regime in Panama. Despite a recent improvement attributable to the national referendum on these treaties, the level of political rights and civil liberties in Panama is still low. Most Panamanian governments, however, regardless of ideology or political or civil practices, have sought a new treaty with the United States.

DOES THE UNITED STATES FACE A REAL CHOICE?

If we are to recognize the severe losses we would almost certainly suffer from rejecting thirteen years of responsible negotiation by both Panama and the United States, we do not now face a real choice.

The gains in ratifying the treaties promptly are, we believe, apparent:

We will demonstrate that we not only support a higher world order based on the advancement of human rights and collaborative international agreements—but that we act on those moral commitments.

We will also demonstrate that a major power can negotiate as an equal with a smaller nation, yield to the latter those rights which were inherently its own, and yet retain for the large power the fundamental advantages which it is in their mutual interest to reinforce.

Because we are convinced that these treaties would best protect American interests and maintain the security of the Canal, we warn against any Senatorial recommendations that would force the reopening of negotiations, a return to an uncertain status quo, and thereby fuel political and paramilitary attacks on the American presence in the Canal area.

Freedom House believes that the U.S. Senate, after full and careful study of the history of the Panama Canal, the extensive negotiating process, and the texts of the agreements already signed, should act promptly to ratify the Panama Canal treaties now before it.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a statement by the leadership of the religious community of Panama, also endorsing these treaties.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PANAMANIAN ARCHBISHOP ON TREATIES

Canal Zone-born Archbishop Marcos McGrath of Panama is the son of a Trenton, N.J., laborer who worked on the construction of the waterway and is the principal spiritual leader of the nation's large Catholic population. He was interviewed by Washington Star Staff Writer Jeremiah O'Leary.

Question. In a real sense, how much influence does the Catholic Church have with the people of Panama on any subject?

McGRATH. Well, they're much more influenced, obviously, on a strictly doctrinal subject or a matter of strict interpretation of morals or liturgy or something that is directly related to religious concerns. When we're talking about social matters, then what we're really doing is interpreting the application of the gospel to the situations. When we talk about problems of poor housing and slum areas and bad distribution of health, lack of civil liberties in Panama, we're not speaking in a strictly dogmatic fashion, but we're pointing out that these things are not consonant with our gospel concept of the dignity of man, the equality of opportunities that all should have. And I suppose this would be true in the matter of the treaties.

Q. Have you spoken out on the subject of the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties?

A. The church has always identified with the preoccupation of the people with the Panama Canal issue. This goes back to my predecessors. For instance, I remember back in 1955 when President Ramon came up to the United States to visit with President Eisenhower. The archbishop of Panama went to the airport with the crowd and then received him when he came back. It's an expression of solidarity on the part of the church with the government as representing the cause of the people. When the riots took place in 1964, I was temporarily in charge of the archdiocese. And myself and the bishops and the clergy had a mass for the solidarity of the people for peace with justice. And since that time, 1964, the matter has been constantly on the frying pan. One of our main efforts is to bring to bear on this question a kind of thinking which is Christian, which is looking for the ethical underpinning of this whole question so this will not be a cause of extremists.

Q. Hasn't this matter come under attack from both the extreme left and the extreme right in Panama?

A. You have to distinguish, I think, in Panama, whether these are independent lefts and rights or whether they are linked to some dogmatic party position. If they're linked to some party position, you ask yourself, "when this party says this, what does Moscow have to say?" Then there is an obedience to be followed which we do not consider to be in the interest of Panama. It's an international obedience. But you do have nationalists in Panama—on the left and on the right and in the center—who feel that these treaties have given too many concessions to the United States and therefore are opposed. There are some who, although they object to the treaties, would nevertheless vote for them because they say it's not what Panama would like to have but it's the best that Panama can get. And probably a good number of people on the plebiscite who voted for the treaties voted in that sense. They were also preoccupied with the treaties that conceded a great deal to the United States, but felt that it's far better to do this than to go back to 10 more years of negotiations.

Q. Did the plebiscite have some element also of a popularity contest for the Torrijos regime involved?

A. After the plebiscite there were several commentators on the radio and television, newspapers, who said that Torrijos should pay a great amount of attention to that plebiscite because it was a statement from the Panamanian public that they want some changes in the government and they want more democratic participation, and so forth and so on. I think this is true now. To what extent that accounts for the 30 percent vote against the treaties, I think this is a combination of both things. There was a number, certainly, that were going to vote against the treaties on the merits of the treaties themselves and a number who did not want these treaties to be approved for this government in power, and the one-third vote is a combination of those two factors. I think we all felt that these two elements of opposition would show themselves. And, honestly, many people who voted in favor of the treaties, they didn't necessarily approve of the Torrijos government, nor did they necessarily like the treaties, but they felt this was the best thing available. The most eloquent case was the little vote in San Blas. San Blas actually voted against the treaties. San Blas are just sick and tired of the government not paying any attention to them. Not only this government, but all the governments.

Q. What position did you take on the plebiscite?

A. We did not know the exact details of the treaties until 7th of September, 1977. Until then we just had rumors of what they were going to be. Before those treaties came to be, we had stressed the necessity of a new treaty, or, as we put it in Spanish, un nuevo tratamiento, a new treatment of Panama, because we have felt for a long time that the 1903 treaty is untenable—not only in the way it came to be, which we know historically, but also because over the years there has developed in the consciousness of nations the right of self-determination of peoples. Nations which had held colonies as their own territory have released those colonies, which have become independent nations. Panama has never been a colony, legally, and I think now sufficiently demonstrated to the American public, that Panama has always been Panamanian territory, including the Canal Zone under U.S. administration and jurisdiction. So with greater reason Panama has a right to its own self-determination. Panama has become over the last generation, particularly, more conscious of itself as a people and a nation. And so this situation of subservience, which the canal has signified—having the heart of a nation, another nation—has become every day more difficult, more uncomfortable.

Q. Was there any change or hardening of your attitude once the details of the treaties became known?

A. Well, I'll tell you. When these treaties were signed on Sept. 7, I was among the many who experienced some surprise. There were some concessions in there that I thought Panama was going to make. I can see now in the course of the debates how hard the negotiators fought for those things and I can see that if they hadn't fought for them the treaties would have had hardly any chance with the Senate today. But it's interesting that they did achieve these things. The very treaty of neutrality is a shocker for most Panamanians. It means that after the year 2000, as far as Panamanians are concerned, the United States will still have the power that can come in there whenever it wants to. And it's precisely what the Senate insists upon for the security and the safe defense and operation of the canal.

Q. How did this affect your attitude during the plebiscite?

A. The churches in Panama—Catholic, Protestant and Jewish communities— withheld our opinions on the treaty until the plebiscite had taken place. And we made it quite clear that everyone should vote and vote as he or she thought best and that the church having supported the necessity for new tratamiento was not necessarily for the treaties. We didn't want to incline or bring pressure on public opinion. Once the plebiscite had been taken—and I think honestly taken—and once it can be said that the Panamanian people supported this, then we are also supporting it because we believe that this is a manifestation of what the Panamanian people accepts that these concessions granted. Therefore we accept them also because what we are fundamentally interested in is this new treatment, which we think is very much for the best for all concerned—United States, Panama and Latin America.

Q. The situation must be resolved.

A. This clause of perpetuity is simply untenable, morally and in terms of international law, in terms of United Nations declarations, self-determination, decolonization, and in terms of the United States' attitude toward the rest of the world, which has to be applied logically also in this case. For everyone concerned, it has to be resolved. The longer it is not resolved, the more serious the problems are for all concerned and we feel that this is the crux of the problem. The other elements—economic, military—have their solution. The solutions have to be sought for the initial purpose of the safe and effective passage through the canal, the defense of the canal and sufficient economic compensation—all this is important. But the fundamental thing really is the sense of a people that has to exercise its national character without jingoism, without exaggerating the nationality of a very small nation. But in order to be a part of a community of nations it has to feel itself as a nation. And this is, I think, what we all agree upon.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a statement about the OAS rights group. There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PANAMA INVITES PROBE BY OAS RIGHTS GROUP

(By Lewis H. Diuguid)

Panama announced yesterday that it has invited the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to make an on-site inspection of alleged infractions.

Gen. Omar Torrijos, the Panamanian strongman who was here last week to sign the Panama Canal treaties negotiated with the United States, declared in a cable to the commission:

"I will give you the keys to the jails. If you find any political prisoners, I will set them free."

U.S. opponents of the canal treaties, along with several Panamanians exiled by Torrijos, have charged that the human rights of Torrijos' opponents are being violated. They say further that the Carter administration, with its stress on human rights, is inconsistent in negotiating with Torrijos, the dictator that they hold responsible for the alleged abuses. Several international monitors of human rights have reported that Panama is relatively free of major abuses.

Torrijos' invitation, read to the council of the Organization of American States here yesterday, said the seven-member rights commission will be allowed to go anywhere in Panama and will be free to talk with anyone.

A state Department spokesman declared: "We feel this visit by an objective international body will be helpful in arriving at a clear definition of the status of human rights in Panama."

The U.S. government has sought to strengthen the rights commission as a means of policing rights in the hemisphere. In June President Carter signed a long-standing OAS convention that will result in formation of an inter-American human-rights courts as soon as 11 nations have ratified the pact.

In another attempt to disarm U.S. opponents of Senate ratification of the canal treaties, Panama has invited U.N. observers to oversee a plebiscite on Oct. 28. Panama's form of ratifying the treaties.

The plebiscite is expected to produce an overwhelming vote for ratification. Conservative U.S. critics—who oppose the treaties' stipulation that the canal will pass to Panama's control in the year 2000—have declared that the plebiscite will be rigged by Torrijos.

The rights commission also received an invitation yesterday from El Salvador to make an on-scene investigation in that Central American nation. Several priests working with the peasants in El Salvador have been killed by terrorists. Critics charge that the military government there condones the terrorism.

Meetings last week between President Carter and Latin presidents here for the treaties's signing appear to be a factor in the renewed activity of the rights commission. Earlier this year both Uruguay and Paraguay refused requests for inspection visits and Chile, after permitting an inspection shortly after the coup there in 1974, has refused to allow a return visit.

OAS Secretary General Alejandro Orfila recently named a Chilean exile, Edmundo Vargas Carenno, as executive secretary of the rights commission. Its members are elected by the OAS council from nominations made by member states.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, the point I am trying to make right here, with all these inclusions in the Record, is that there is a large body of knowledge that is reasonable on this subject. Nobody quarrels with the fact that they have not had elections. That is a fact.

Mr. ALLEN. I quarrel with it.

Mr. GRAVEL. Wait a second. Do you want to quarrel with most of the nations of the world? Do you want to go to war right now with most of the nations of the world? We take the world as it is. We take the human race as it is. We are in a forward plunge toward greater maturity. It is going to take time to mature. It is going to take time for everybody in the world to enjoy the same degree of freedom.

If there is a real, sincere desire to see the Panamanians free, to see them realize the aspirations and the hopes that we think are important, the best way to do it is to improve their economy, to improve their economic well-being, and that, per se, will bring a great deal of freedom with it. The best way to do that is to give some justice to the Panamanians.

Is it not odd that those who, out of hand, oppose any change of the status quo, which is so unjust to these most unfortunate people, really oppose the first opportunity these people have had to regain their birthright and to maximize the economic benefits from their birthright? There is nothing wrong with that. It is just proper and fair.

If there is anything the American people have, it is a sense of fair play. So I do not understand the logic that says they are under a dictatorship. They are not free; and, my God, we are not only going to make sure they are not free, but also, we are going to make sure they are poor. That is what we are going to do.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not this publication by Freedom House, which gives the Torrijos regime a 7 rating on political rights, also give Russia the same 7 rating? Would that not equate the conditions in Panama with the conditions in Russia on political rights?

Mr. GRAVEL. First off, I do not know.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator had it in his hand a moment ago.

Mr. GRAVEL. All I had in my hand was the evaluation of Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. I say to the Senator that it does.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know, and I would say that I do not know how they define their 7. I would say that they probably would evaluate a 7 in any country that does not have free elections. That is a big spectrum in this world. Any country that does not have free elections is a 7. The other is civil rights. So there is a big difference.

As Ambassador Jorden stated in the quotation I read, there is nobody being arrested off the streets; there is nobody being tortured. We had Amnesty International go down and look at it. They do not find a gross problem like you are trying to intimate. We had the Organization of American States go into it. We are a member of that organization, as a government. We have an ambassador to that organization. They do not find any gross violations.

You have a scenario of playing with little numbers and saying the Soviet Union has a 7. They do not have free elections in the Soviet Union—I will stipulate that right now—and they have not had any elections for political officials in the leadership of Panama since—

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator think a rating of 6 on a scale of 1 to 7 is very good in civil rights?

Mr. GRAVEL. For this organization's rating, no, I do not think it is very good; but I do not know the individuals and I have not talked with them, whoever did the rating. It is the first I have heard of Freedom House.

I do not claim to know all the organizations. I have heard of Amnesty International, and I think they do good work. In fact, I believe they got a Nobel prize a couple of years ago. They are highly recognized, and I stand to be corrected in this regard. If they got a Nobel prize, they are a pretty heavy organization. They looked, and they did not find anything.

Mr. ALLEN. Is Amnesty International an organization—I am not familiar with it myself—is it an organization that has recommended general amnesty for draft dodgers and deserters? Is that the thrust of its work?

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know. I do not know if the president of the Amnesty International beats his wife. I do not know.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Senator thinks it is a prodraft dodger organization; is that what the Senator thinks it is?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know. I am just asking the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought the Senator was vouching for them and now he does not know about them.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know if the president of Amnesty International has been beating his wife or children or if he has a draft dodger in his family or if he is housing draft dodgers.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator a moment ago was praising the organization as an organization to be trusted.

Mr. GRAVEL. I think they won a Nobel prize.

Mr. ALLEN. Is that right? For what?

Mr. GRAVEL. For going out doing good work.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I see. I did not know they awarded Nobel prizes for that. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague from Alabama. He is a most enjoyable person to have a colloquy with. I think that we deal with a little bit of levity on this subject, but I do not think that the American people are going to be pulled off target here because so often in this whole debate and in the information that pours out of Congress on this issue, and not only out of Congress, out of the extreme right wing of the United States, pours out about what all this treaty is going to do, how terrible it is, the world is going to come to an end. I am just chagrined that we are spending so much time on it. This treaty is not worth this kind of recognition. The only reason it is getting this recognition is because it is a highly emotional issue. It goes to our guts. It goes to the American pride. It appeals to the best of our jingoism. It calls up our greatest degree of chauvinism—that we built this canal, a lot of big macho, and we own this canal. The Senator knows we euchred these poor people out of it—I mean euchred them out of it, and my colleague from Alabama knows that.

I am not the last person in the world to accept good Yankee trading. I think we are good Yankee traders, but I just think it is gross when we take advantage of poor little countries and set upon them and then take this money that rightfully belongs to them and then give them a job, throw them a few coins, and tell them that we are doing them a favor. That is a little strong for me.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ALLEN. As I understand it, the Senator has been to Panama and in conference with the dictator of that country; is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. Why did the Senator not say I had met with the chief of state of Panama?

Mr. ALLEN. Use any words the Senator wishes.

Mr. GRAVEL. Why does he like that word "dictator," as if I went down there and sat down with some guy who had a 45 on the shoulder and had a bullwhip in the other hand, and then I talked to him? No. I went down.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator talked with Mr. Torrijos.

Mr. GRAVEL. I met with him on three occasions. The first time I met Mr. Torrijos was here in Washington. Does the Senator know where I met him? It was at that patriotic beautiful Blair House right across from the White House, and I met him on an American shrine, and Mr. Torrijos was in civilian clothes.

Mr. ALLEN. That was not the Sting White House apartment?

Mr. GRAVEL. He did not have any armed guards around except our people.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. I just asked the Senator a few questions.

Mr. GRAVEL. I briefed him on what I thought was important to this country, and that is the fact that the present Panama Canal is not as economically as important as it used to be and it is becoming very unimportant and that by the year 2000 it could almost be worthless, which is my particular view.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is why I get a little disturbed sometime when the Senator prepares an amendment that insists that we unilaterally have the power to station troops in Panama in perpetuity.

The canal might not last in perpetuity. It might not even be worth a darn in the year 2000. The Senator wants the right in his amendment, he wants the right to be able to have troops in Panama in perpetuity.

Mr. ALLEN. The President can withdraw them any time.

Mr. GRAVEL. Is that not a bit too much?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I think not.

Mr. GRAVEL. Why? Suppose we are not using the Panama Canal in the year 2000. The Senator still wants to be able to put troops there.

Mr. ALLEN. No. To be able to but not mandatory.

Mr. GRAVEL. Does the Senator want to be able to let any other country put troops in the United States unilaterally? Does he?

Mr. ALLEN. Do I what?

Mr. GRAVEL. Does the Senator want to be able to let foreign countries put troops in the United States unilaterally?

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, that is not the situation here.

Mr. GRAVEL. It is not? It is exactly the situation the Senator is asking the Panamanians to put up with.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is absolutely wrong. What we are trying to do is provide for the defense of the canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. Say the canal is useless, and closed.

Mr. ALLEN. We would not have to do it. It is up to the President.

Mr. GRAVEL. Then I ask the Senator again. Would he want the President of France to be able to put troops in the United States unilaterally? Take them to Alabama. How would he like it to be able to wake up one day and there are some French troops in Mobile, Ala., at the will of the President of France?

Mr. ALLEN. We have had troops in the Panama Canal Zone for almost 70 years.

Mr. GRAVEL. Wait a second.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me finish.

Mr. GRAVEL. The scenario is the canal is closed.

Mr. ALLEN. We do not have to do that. It is up to the President.

Mr. GRAVEL. Why does the Senator insist on having that right?

Mr. ALLEN. Because it is necessary for the proper defense of the canal, because under the leadership amendment all of the troops will have been withdrawn from Panama, and the only way that under the leadership amendment we could defend the canal would be to invade Panama. But the Senator strayed from the question I asked him. I asked him if he had conferred with, shall I say, Mr. Torrijos, in Panama. That is what I asked the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. And I stated yes, in Washington, but before we do that we have a lot of time this afternoon—it is only 5 minutes after 2—we have a lot of time. Let us just stick to what the Senator thinks the amendment does.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. GRAVEL. I will be happy to answer.

Mr. ALLEN. [continuing]. If, in his conference with Mr. Torrijos in Panama, if he and other Senators questioned Mr. Torrijos about his poor human rights position and record and if he did not, in fact, promise to do better? Was it the group of Senators the Senator was in, or was it another group of Senators to whom Torrijos promised that he would do better in the field of human rights?

Mr. GRAVEL. I did not bring up the subject with him.

Mr. ALLEN. Was it brought up?

Mr. GRAVEL. I presume maybe some Senators did. If they did, they can speak to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. GRAVEL. OK. So the Senator is asking me if I brought it up. I say no, I did not bring it up.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not ask the Senator. I asked if in the group of Senators that he accompanied, if it was brought up.

Mr. GRAVEL. No; I was not there with a group of Senators. I was alone with him.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. GRAVEL. I did not bring up that subject. I brought up economic matters.

Mr. ALLEN. Did he promise to do better? It was not the Senator, then, who he made that promise to; is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. No; but that would be a funny conversation with me. I am talking to him about a sea level canal and all of a sudden he jumps up and says, "Senator, I promise to do better." It does not make any sense. We are talking about economic matters, the obsolescence rate of the present Panama Canal.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator knows he made that promise to the delegates of the U.S. Senate.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) nods his head.

It must have had a pretty bad record if he is promising to do better. Why would he have to do better if he had a good record in that regard?

Mr. GRAVEL. Going back to the Senator's amendment, why would he insist on having something from the Panamanians that he would not let anybody have here; that is, he does not want to let the President of France have the right to unilaterally send troops to Mobile, Ala.? Why does he want to have the President of the United States to be able to send troops to Panama in the year 2050 or the year 5010?

Mr. ALLEN. Because we have a tremendous asset there, that I would think the Senator from Alaska would want to see defended, and that is the very function and purpose supposedly of the leadership amendment that we would be able to defend the canal. My amendment does not destroy the leadership's amendment. It accepts that as a good provision, that we could come back into Panama after having withdraw all of our troops by the year 2000 and defend the canal. What I am suggesting be done by this amendment is not pull all of our troops out prior to the year 2000, if the condition in Panama indicates that troops are needed for the defense of the canal, because we do not know what the situation is going to be in Panama in the year 2000. We should not close out all of our options, close all of our doors on the right to properly defend the canal.

It does not make that mandatory. If the President of the United States thinks it is necessary for the defense of the canal and for maintaining neutrality of the canal, to continue our military presence there beyond the year 2000, then we would have a right to do so. It just implements, adds to, and makes stronger the administration, the leadership, amendment.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. If I could respond briefly to this one point. Again, I want to quote the Commandant of the Marines, who might have some experience in this area. He states:

I do not believe, however, that successful defense of the canal is dependent upon continued U.S. military presence in Panama.

So that takes care of that, Now, in the year 5000——

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I disagree with the Senator that that takes care of it.

Mr. GRAVEL. It does. For the year 5000, why do we need the right for the President of the United States to send troops to Panama?

Mr. ALLEN. That is not within the contemplation of the amendment. It says they can be maintained there beyond the year 2000.

Mr. GRAVEL. Do you not think that could also extend to the year 5000?

Mr. ALLEN. He does not have to do it, and it would be up to him whether he did that.

Furthermore, under these side agreements, we have provisions made for our pulling our troops out long before the year 2000, and I would not be surprised if that does not take place.

I just want it understood that I do not agree that a statement by the distinguished commandant of the Marine Corps——

Mr. GRAVEL. The commandant of the Marine Corps.

Mr. ALLEN. That that takes care of the matter. I do not care how much prestige and ability General Wilson has, even if he had the military prowess of Napoleon, anyone knows it is easier to defend the canal with the presence of troops there in the Canal Zone than it is to send in an invading force; you have already got a beachhead there, and I do not care what any military man says who is serving at the pleasure of the President, I do not contend that is at all conclusive of the military situation.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LEAHY. I discussed precisely the same issue with our military commanders in Panama, with members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff here in Washington, and with others.

Certainly I agree to one extent with the Senator from Alabama, that as far as defending an area is concerned, in most cases having a military base already there is preferable. Not in every case, of course, because sometimes the military bases themselves will limit your freedom of action.

But is it not a fact—I ask this question of my friend the Senator from Alaska—that if we maintain military bases after the year 2000 there, what that means is, of course, that we are causing a constant drain of American tax dollars in maintaining bases for a remotely possible contingency?

Mr. GRAVEL. Very possibly so, yes. We do not know what the situation would be in the year 2000, but under the treaties, if the canal needs defending, we have an obligation to defend the canal, and so does the nation of Panama. Maybe their defense effort will be sufficient to defend the canal, and we will not have to spend any of our tax money to defend the canal.

But what we are talking about in this amendment of the Senator from Alabama is something very different from that.

Mr. LEAHY. That was going to be my next question, or my next point of commentary.

Mr. GRAVEL. We are talking about something, essentially, that the Senator does not want to have happen to the people of Alabama, but he is darn well willing to have it happen to the people of Panama, and I just get torn a little bit by that.

Mr. ALLEN. There is no parallel between Panama and Alabama.

Mr. GRAVEL. There is very much of a parallel.

Mr. LEAHY. If I could finish what I was saying, it occurs to me, in listening to my friend from Alaska and my friend from Alabama, and it occurs to me in looking around the world where we have very real interests, very strong interests, if we take a look at it—I think we have to take a look first at our NATO commitments and our commitments to the North American Continent. I know of no countries where we have NATO commitments and where we are presently spending billions of dollars a year, where we have a right to maintain American bases in perpetuity.

With that in mind, and considering the fact that our military presence is so far more vital in these NATO areas, by trying to put on this amendment to the treaties, are we not saying, in actuality, that the United States will talk a good game in rejecting questions of imperialism and rejecting questions of colonialism, but we will not follow through with it?

I happen to feel, looking at what is happening in the horn of Africa and other parts of the world, that the one imperialist country today is the Soviet Union; and I hate to see us in a situation where we allow the United States to be tagged with a tag of imperialism.

So I look back again at the fact that, from a military standpoint, we consider not only the military security of the United States, but the military security of our allies, and that our strongest commitments and our most expensive ones, you might say, are within our NATO commitments.

In none of those do we have rights in perpetuity. In none of those do we have the right of the American people, even now, in the year 2000, in the year 2050, in the year 3000, or anywhere down the line, to say, "If we decide we want a base, if we decide we want a beachhead, or we just want to move in, not because you call on us at this time or any other time, we come, because we have always had tucked away this little ace up our sleeve."

That is precisely what we are saying to Panama. We are saying, "All right, we will give you a treaty, and we will say, on the one hand, that we are really withdrawing, that we are withdrawing a presence that more and more is seen as either a colonial presence or an imperialist presence, but at the same time we are telling you, you may or may not like it, but any time, if we feel like it, we will come back in there."

I cannot imagine any sovereign country accepting that. There is no question in my mind that with such an amendment on the treaty, the Panamanians would reject the treaty; I think they would reject it no matter what else we put in there, no matter what economic considerations might be given them, no matter what plans are made for any other withdrawals, if they knew we reserved that right, and knowing that the U.S. Government, from past performance, would not mind spending the tens of millions of dollars it would cost to keep those bases after the year 2000, I cannot imagine them possibly accepting it; and I think we ought to consider that for what it is.

I have no objection to our State Department or our Executive sitting down and talking, separate from this treaty, with the Panamanians on questions of mutual defense, or questions of aid of their own defense, or their aid of our defense, of the neutrality of the treaty, but I ask my friend from Alaska, does it not appear to you that putting this amendment on the treaty, albeit it might sound very nice, it might be well-worded, is the surest way possible to guarantee the rejection of any treaty by the Panamanians?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am positive that the Panamanians would reject it, just as I am positive that the citizens of Mobile, the citizens of Alabama, or the citizens of Alaska would reject such a treaty.

Mr. LEAHY. Or the citizens of Vermont, I can assure my good friend from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. Or the citizens of Vermont. No American would stand still and permit a right of another country to station in perpetuity troops in their land. I mean you just do not give those rights. So when a Senator puts forth an amendment like this, what is it for? It is obviously to destroy. This is not a credible amendment; it is just a tactical way of trying to destroy the treaty. But I do not think it is a very good one, for the very simple reason that when you go to the issue of defense, there has been ample testimony in the Armed Services Committee and in the Foreign Relations Committee that our colleague from Alabama is approaching the defense argument all wrong.

You can defend the canal. We are a superpower; we can defend the canal from anybody. But what are we going to have then? We are going to have a ditch of water that is not usable, that you cannot get commercial vessels through, and the record is really complete on this.

I would just like to give a statement from General McAuliffe, our head of the command down there:

However even with the sizeable force or a larger one I would say that unless extraordinary measures are prevented such as moving across the national boundaries, there is no way that I could see that I could prevent the interruption of the canal.

Then I go to a colloquy between Senator Nunn and General McAuliffe. Senator Nunn on page 81 of the Armed Services hearings states:

With that kind of force, could you keep the canal from being closed?

General McAULIFFE. I don't think so. Senator, I think I could assure that the canal is not destroyed, that is, rendered useless, where you couldn't do anything with it; but I think that it would be virtually impossible to keep transiting ships from being stopped . . .

And then it goes on.

The point I am making here, which is what the Senator from Vermont alludes to, is that we can send in all the troops we want, but the whole purpose of the exercise of either defense or of these treaties, or I would think of anything—otherwise we are standing here being ridiculous—the whole purpose of the exercise is to be able to commercially use the canal and to use it in time of war for our war vessels when needed.

Our military people tell us that regardless of what military capability we have, sure, we can keep possession of it, but it is keeping possession of something that cannot work. So what is the point? What is the point of insulting the Panamanian people, telling them, "We are going to go for a treaty, but you have to let us be able to station our military on your soil in the year 2000, in the year 5000, the year 10,000, even if there is not a canal in operation. You have to give us inherently that right."

That is a little much.

Mr. LEAHY. Would it be possible to look at countries where our military presence is far more vital to the security of the world, such as Germany, France, Italy, England, countries like that, where we do not have such rights, where we could not have such rights if we asked for them?

Mr. GRAVEL. And, as the Senator well knows, where we have a little presence, we pay. I wonder why the Senator from Alabama does not want to pay them for these rights. He just wants to tell them, "We are going to be there in perpetuity whether you like it or not." We pay every other place in the world. We pay for our defense, for the collective defense of the world, but not in Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I will be happy to.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator loses sight of the fact that at the present time we own the entire Canal Zone. All this would do would be to allow the President, if he thought it was necessary to defend the canal, to retain a military presence there. That would not occupy but just mighty little space out of the 500-square-mile area of the canal.

I am wondering, too, since the Senator is so disturbed about keeping troops in Panama, why he has not raised any objection to the fact that under the Panama Canal Treaty we will keep troops there for 22 years. He seems to be raising no objection to that.

The historical parallel between a State in the United States and Panama is an entirely different situation. No foreign government owns any property in Alabama, and certainly they have no reason to come there and defend Alabama. But where we have such a tremendous national asset as the Panama Canal, and as the thrust of the leadership amendment is to provide a way whereby we may unilaterally defend the canal, allowing us to maintain a presence there, it does not violate the present situation that exists. It merely aids the leadership amendment, which is deficient on this point.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I might state also to the distinguished Senator from Alaska, so he will quit talking about the year 5000, I am sending a modification to the desk.

Mr. President, I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Sasser). The modification will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) proposes a modification to his amendment No. 40.

On page 2, line 2, after "1999" insert "but not beyond December 31, 2019.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Strike article I, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

ARTICLE I

The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this Treaty. The same regime of neutrality shall apply to any other international waterway that may be built either partially or wholly in the territory of the Republic of Panama: Provided, That the military presence of the United States in what was the Panama Canal Zone on September 7, 1977, shall be continued beyond December 31, 1999, but not beyond December 31, 2019, if the President of the United States deems it necessary for the defense of the Canal or the maintenance of the neutrality thereof and shall prior to December 31, 1999, so certify to the Government of Panama.

Mr. GRAVEL. How long would that be?

Mr. ALLEN. It is 20 years. I just did not want the Senator to be talking about the year 5000. We do not have to worry about that. If he wants to talk about 2019 he can do it. The Panama Canal Treaty gives the United States the primary responsibility for the next 22 years of maintaining troops there in the Panama Canal Zone, defending the canal and maintaining its neutrality.

What this amendment would do would be to tell the President, if he thinks it is necessary to continue a military presence in the Panama Canal Zone for an additional 20 years, he shall have that right. I hope the Senator will not be talking about the year 5000.

Mr. GRAVEL. No, but I will bring up the year 2020. Why would the Senator capriciously cut off this unusual right he wants and not keep it for the year 2020?

Mr. ALLEN. Because the Senator from Alaska would object to that even more than he would object to 2019. Inasmuch as the Panama Canal Treaty gives us 22 years, this would merely add an additional 20 years, during which we would have the right, if the President at that time deems it necessary to protect the canal, for an additional 20 years to maintain troops there for the defense of the canal.

Panama ought to be just as glad as the United States to defend the canal because it is a profitmaking operation for them as soon as we ratify these treaties. They are going to skim off around $100 million a year to be used in the operation of their government, whereas the United States operates the canal on a nonprofit basis. This would allow defense of the canal for an additional 20 years without cost, I might say, to Panama.

Mr. GRAVEL. Does the Senator think we have not skimmed off anything in the last 60 years?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

Mr. GRAVEL. We have not?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir, except the same benefit as all nations of the world who have waterway commerce have had. We have operated it on a nonprofit basis.

I might say also that we still owe $319 million on the canal, unpaid capital investments. We are going to write that $319 million off, giving it to Panama as well. We are going to forego the interest payment of some $16 million or $17 million a year. Certainly, the United States has operated it on a nonprofit basis and have not even paid for the original investment as yet.

Mr. GRAVEL. Could I address myself to that one point? Here we subsidized the maritime interests of the world for the last 60 years. And we have an illusion that the Panamanians, now that they are going to get their birthright back, are going to skim it off, and we do not get into the skimming. How really tragic. Here we euchre them out of it. We built a canal that cost $319 million. We collect $20 million a year interest on the money, subsidize our people. Presently, today, it is more than 50 percent obsolete. By the year 2000, it will probably be over 90 percent obsolete. And we have the crust to turn around and tell them, be happy with what we have done for you, go in peace.

What a terrible tragedy.

Mr. ALLEN. How much of an investment did Panama make in the canal?

Mr. GRAVEL. It is as if the Senator said, How much did the landowner of Rockefeller Center, the fellow who owns the land, what has his investment been? Was the investment in building the building or was the investment in the land?

They invested the land. We suckered them out of it, and we did it with a straight face.

Mr. ALLEN. I am under the impression that if we owe anything to anybody, it would be Colombia, not Panama.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator yield on that?

Mr. GRAVEL. We shall get to Colombia in a minute.

Yes, I yield.

Mr. LEAHY. There is a point everybody seems to overlook. We talk about the canal being 10 miles by 50 miles, approximately. It occurs to the Senator from Vermont that if we look at a map of the area, we see a very large area that juts out from there. That is what surrounds Gatun Lake.

If we look at the fact that it takes somewhere between, I believe it is 52 or 58 million gallons of fresh water from Gatun Lake for one transit, for whatever is going to use the locks in one transit; whether that is one big ship or a couple of big ships, it is that many million gallons of fresh water washed out to sea every time.

If we want to get truly technical on that and claim that we own everything down through that Canal Zone and that is ours, we are not in any way interfering with a national asset, what would we do if the watershed started being diverted off from Gatun Lake? I tell you what we would do. During a very large part of the year, we would not have any transiting of ships. Or we would have ships that would have to be so unloaded to transit—and they would have to pay the same amount for their bulk, whether they are loaded or unloaded—that they just would not even use it.

That is certainly a national asset. Certainly, the geographical location of it is a national asset, just as I consider, in my own State of Vermont—a State that I feel is one of the most beautiful in the country—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LEAHY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. I shall just finish by saying that every country can determine to some extent internally what they consider to be a national asset but, certainly, an objective standard could be made as far as the Panama Canal is concerned. The national asset to Panama is the location, is the isthmus, is the watershed, and the inclusive parts of Lake Gatun which feed the canal, and without which the canal would not even operate.

I yield back to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Senator from Alabama touched on history a little bit. I think it might be enlightening to the American people to delve into history.

When I talked about the birthright of Panama, he responded, what about Colombia? All I can tell him about Colombia is that when we cut a deal with them, they turned it down unanimously, and it was not as bad as the deal we foisted on Panama.

What about Colombia?

Mr. ALLEN. We made a deal with Colombia. In 1924, we paid them $25 million and, at the same time, we paid Panama $10 million, plus an annuity of a quarter of a million dollars a year, which is now up to $2.3 million a year.

I state to the Senator from Alaska that I have no objection to raising the amount we pay to Panama, providing we keep the ownership and control and the maintenance and the right to defend it. It is not just a dollars-and-cents proposition.

By these treaties, we change the whole nature of the operation. The United States operates it as a nonprofit venture. It realizes no profit from the enterprise. Yet, according to Economic Minister Barletta, by his own statement in Panama, in the 22 years of the existence or the life of the Panama Canal Treaty, Panama received $2,262 million in revenues. That is not counting the more than $1 billion in assets turned over to Panama immediately; not counting the Panama Canal Railroad; not counting the tremendous value of the Panama Canal, which is estimated to have a replacement cost of around $10 billion. They are going to skim off, to use the words that the distinguished Senator quoted me as using, $100 million a year, which will be charged against the tolls on the ships transiting the canal. That changes the entire operation, changing it from a nonprofit operation that the United States has to a $100 million-a-year profit for Panama.

Well, you say, maybe that comes out of the tolls. Well, even if it came out of the tolls, it would be a burden on shipping. The United States has a very large percentage of that shipping. This seems to me, I shall say halfway facetiously, as an anticonsumer treaty, because the added tolls are going to have to be charged up against the ultimate price of the goods being transported.

So, that is the vast difference in the situation that will exist after the treaties from the situation that exists now.

Oh, you say, it has to come out of the toll. Well, there is just a little bit of a joker there, I say to the distinguished Senator from Alaska. It is provided that, at the end of the life of the first treaty, which will end with this century, whatever debts the Panama Canal Commission has—which is the successor to the Panama Canal Company—will have to be paid by the American taxpayer, because we have to deliver the canal to Panama free of all debts and liens of any sort. So it seems to me that we are giving the canal away and we are, in fact, paying the Panamanians to take it.

Mr. GRAVEL. First, we are not paying the Panamanians to take it. Two, we are not giving the canal away.

We have made a ton of money off the canal. What we have done with all this money that we have made is subsidize our maritime interests. The Senator is right, we have subsidized the consumers of the world at the expense of Panama. Since we are one of the greatest consumers in the world, we fed ourselves first; we stood in line first.

That is exactly what has happened. It has been operated as a nonprofit public utility. What is wrong with somebody owning an asset and getting a profit from it? We expect that in our economic society. There is something wrong if that does not happen.

Mr. GARN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GRAVEL. Let me finish this one point and I shall be happy to yield.

We have a double standard. It is great for the United States of America to make a profit off our industriousness, off our capital, off our oil, whatever we have. But if we have the might and we can force some other little country to heel, what we do is not let that little country get the same benefits that we have for our citizens.

That is essentially what has gone on in Panama. We fixed it through our might to get the canal—we built it. We are proud of this technical accomplishment. But over the years, we have taken their heritage and seen that it has been operated on a nonprofit basis, meaning that they got little or nothing for it. So, when we talk about what now the Panamanians will be able to receive for this obsolete canal, because we are giving them back the canal after it has all been used up, we are giving them the rind after we have sucked it dry. I quote from another authority, John Wayne again, that the United Nations—he is quoting from another source:

The United Nations Economic Commission made a survey of the value of the canal. Over the past 50 years it has been a saving to the American consumer—

And, of course, to consumers of the world, anybody who goes through the canal—and producers, a direct savings of $12 billion.

The canal only cost $319 million, but we were able to save $12 billion by operating it as a nonprofit public utility for the world.

I do not mind that. I do not mind ripping off a little bit. I do not mind taking a little bit of advantage. But let us be fair. We do not permit that to happen in this country. When we have a public utility in the United States, we are allowed to make 15 percent, that is the conventional figure now for return on investment.

What is so wrong with letting the Panamanians make that kind of money?

Also, now that times have changed, it is the last cry of colonialism, "Well, we will give them a little more money."

The French said that when they left Algeria. The British said that when they left Suez. That will not wash any more. We are going to have to give it up. Times have changed.

These are people that are sovereign and entitled to the same justice and equality as ourselves in the world community, and not an ounce less.

If they do not make that demand, I, as an American citizen, would make that demand for them because I cherish that freedom as an American citizen. I cherish that equality. And I want them as a citizen of the world to enjoy the same freedom as I do.

I know that the only way they can realize that freedom is through their economic birthright, and their birthright is the fact that their land is not wealthy like Alaska, or not populated like Alabama, with an economy like Alabama, but that their land has a characteristic that is most unusual in the world; it is the narrowest part between the entire lands of the hemisphere. It is the narrowest part between the two oceans. So their economic advantage is that path between the seas.

To not permit the people who are citizens of that land to enjoy that economic birthright is just unfair. I do not think in the final analysis the American people will stand for that unfairness.

I am happy to yield to my colleague from Utah (Mr. Garn).

Mr. GARN. I thank the Senator from Alaska.

I am a little bit puzzled by his talk about profit. That is what I want to ask him a question about.

Far be it from me to disagree with somebody making a profit. I think profits make this country run. But when the Senator talks about allowing them a profit, then I would like him to respond to the testimony of the Comptroller General of the United States and the Governor of the Canal Zone. They come out in their testimony before the Armed Services Committee and say that there will be a profit next year, in fiscal 1979, with no treaty, of $9.3 million, but as soon as the treaties are signed we will have a $36.7 million loss, or a $46 million difference the first year. This will rise to a $58 million difference by 1984, and that beyond 1984 we better be aware that tolls may not be able to be raised sufficiently to cover the guaranteed payments to Panama.

Now, if we just want to turn it over to them, why do we not just give it to them and say, "Fine, you run it as a utility and charge what tolls you think you can get without diminishing traffic," and we hope the oil from Alaska continues to flow through the canal, which it probably will not.

Mr. GRAVEL. Why not?

Mr. GARN. Because they are talking about building pipelines through the United States so it will not have to go down there any more.

Mr. GRAVEL. All right.

Mr. GARN. This is testimony of the Comptroller General of the United States, not the Senator from Utah.

So that disturbs me. The Senator's thesis of profit is fine. Let them run it as a business enterprise if they can, but tell me why we guarantee those annuities to them, even if the tolls are not sufficient? Why should we guarantee annuities to them? That is the cost to the American taxpayer, and the taxpayer had better listen and be aware. The IRA study shows a point of diminishing returns. The Panamanians will get their cut. But that is not free enterprise or profit, that is the American taxpayer guaranteeing that Panama is not going to take any risks.

A debt-free canal, guaranteed annuities, regardless of what the hell happens to the tolls or the sensitivity or the—

Mr. GRAVEL. Could I respond to my colleague?

First, when he says guarantee annuities, the only guarantee we have in this treaty is to pay them $10 million. That is the only guarantee that is a flat statement. The rest is tied to tolls and profit.

Mr. GARN. OK, 30 cents per ton.

Mr. GRAVEL. No. Let me say it again so it is very clear to the Senator.

The only thing we are committed to pay is $10 million a year. OK?

So there is no other open-ended obligation, so to speak. That is a guaranteed payment if there is not 1 ton of cargo that goes through the canal. Under these treaties we have got to pay $10 million a year. That is the right for being there.

Now, the revenues—

Mr. GARN. But we are not there any more, that is my question, why should we guarantee anything?

Mr. GRAVEL. Can the Senator not read the English language? The treaties say very clearly we will be there until the year 2000.

Why does the Senator keep making the public statement that everybody can hear that we will not be there any more? Read me a line now, read me a single line in these two treaties that throws us out before the year 2000.

Mr. GARN. OK, quoting the Governor—

Mr. GRAVEL. Forget the Governor. I am talking about the treaties before us. Read me one line that speaks of where we have to get out before 2000.

We operate the canal until the year 2000. So please do not make contrary statements.

Mr. GARN. If the Senator will let me respond, I will tell him, and the Governor of the Canal Zone is important. He happens to run it. I think he knows a little bit more about it than the Senator and I, a lot more about it. He happens to have the responsibility to run it.

Mr. GRAVEL. He loses his job if these treaties go through, so I can understand his concern.

Mr. GARN. But let us not let the American people misunderstand. Most of the American people think we are there until the year 2000, that nothing important changes, and I will quote the Governor of the Canal Zone whether the Senator likes it or not.

Mr. GRAVEL. Quote the treaties. Quote the treaties. Why not quote the treaties?

We are getting off into an argument that does not make any sense.

The Senator is saying he wants to quote the statement of the head of the Canal Zone when really what we are debating is not what the heck he thinks but what has been signed by the two Governments, the Government of Panama and the Government of the United States.

If the Senator wants to quote something, quote that, not his opinion, my opinion, or Charlie's opinion.

Mr. GARN. I am not quoting my own——

Mr. GRAVEL. Quote the treaties. They say very clearly, and I quote:

ARTICLE III

CANAL OPERATION AND MANAGEMENT

1. The Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America the rights to manage, operate, and maintain the Panama Canal, its complementary works, installations and equipment and to provide for the orderly transit of vessels through the Panama Canal.

That is the language of the treaty.

How can the Senator stand there and tell the American people over a public radio that we are giving up the canal as soon as these treaties are signed? How can the Senator do that?

Mr. GARN. It is very easy, because that is exactly what takes place.

We continue to operate it under a new Canal Zone Commission composed of five Americans and four Panamanians, is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. All appointed——

Mr. GARN. Is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes.

Mr. GARN. Yes or no?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes, all appointed by the United States.

I mean, we are so great on this treaty that we appoint the Panamanians to serve on the Commission. Can you imagine that?

Can you imagine my going into your State and saying, "We'll have a joint commission of operation, but I'm going to pick your guys."

Mr. ALLEN. Wait a minute, will the Senator yield for a question?
Mr. GARN. May I finish this?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would like the Senator from Utah's cooperation.

Mr. GARN. The fact, immediately upon ratification of these treaties, the Canal Zone Government is done away with and all sovereignty of the Canal Zone is returned to the Republic of Panama.

Mr. GRAVEL. Thank God it is, because we can more efficiently operate the canal and get rid of socialism.

Mr. GARN. Not maintain any governmental function——

Mr. GRAVEL. Why do we need a governmental function, or why do we need a government, or why do we need a vessel?

We have a vessel that is owned by the Government of the United States, by the Panama Canal Company, which is literally the Government of the United States, that picks up goods in New Orleans and ships them down to the zone. Here is the Panama Canal, which has thousands of ships a year going through. Do you think we could rely on free enterprise to bring down some goods for the commissary? Heck, no. We have a vessel that is owned—we used to have five. Do you know who cut them down? That great Republican free enterpriser, President Dwight Eisenhower, and I salute him on this occasion for what he did.

They had five vessels that used to pick up goods in New Orleans, take it to Panama, and unload it there so the people in the zone could have it. They did not want to use the free enterprise system.

Now you are saying how terrible it is that we are going to lose the government of the Panama Canal Zone. It has been a millstone around our neck for 60 years. We cannot tell what is efficient operation of the Panama Canal today, because all the money slides in. The tolls were never raised, but expenses of the canal were always equal to what the growing traffic became. Is that not an interesting phenomenon? For 60 years, the needs of the canal always measured up to the totally ascending amount of the traffic. I just am struck by that phenomenon. I think it is a lot of socialism, that whatever you put on the table, that is what it costs you, and that is the way we have been operating the canal, within the zone.

I hope we will do away with that stuff, so that we can let the people operate a canal—not operate a government, not operate a PX, not operate the movies, not operate the cleaners. Stop all that stuff. Just let them operate the canal, and let them go to the cleaners downtown.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I yield.

Mr. GARN. The Senator is very articulate and persuasive and rhetorical, editorializing on what I am saying.

Let me summarize so the people know the facts. The Canal Zone Government is replaced. Without arguing whether it should be, let us talk about facts. It is replaced. The Canal Zone Company is done away with, and the Republic of Panama does take over all governmental functions within that area. It is a fact that it goes from a $9.7 million profit for fiscal 1979 to a $30.67 million loss. It is a fact that through 1984 it will go up——

Mr. GRAVEL. But——

Mr. GARN. Let me finish.

Mr. GRAVEL. You are talking about the future. How can you say those are facts? We do not know what they are going to make next year. Somebody told you that.

Mr. GARN. We are probably conservative, and they probably will be higher losses.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know that we are being conservative. It depends on how much oil from Alaska is going to go through there at those uneconomic prices. We cannot tell.

Mr. GARN. In the finish, we are guaranteeing the annuity, whether the canal revenues are sufficient to take care of it or not. Those are facts. Those are in the treaty. I do not care to get into as rhetorical a battle as you have been carrying on.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not know that. People give me testimony when their livelihood is involved.

Mr. GARN. The livelihood of the Comptroller General of the United States is not dependent upon this treaty.

Mr. GRAVEL. I would like you to produce for the record the testimony by the Comptroller General.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, would the Senator like to have a reiteration of testimony by the Governor of the Canal Zone that was given to the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Committee on Appropriations no later than yesterday?

Mr. GRAVEL. I think we need that information at this time.

Mr. BAYH. I do not want to interject myself unnecessarily. The discussion by my friend from Alaska and my friend from Utah has been stimulating and interesting. But inasmuch as we are talking about economics, and my friend from Utah talks about the Governor of the Canal Zone, I do not know whether he has had a chance to talk to the Governor.

Coincidentally, it was sort of accidental that yesterday, as I sat down to preside over the first session for this year's budget of the Department of Transportation—in other words, that part of our appropriation bill that includes all the money that goes into all the areas of transportation—I found myself face to face with the man who is the Governor of the Canal Zone right now.

I say to my friend from Alaska that when they were carving up the jurisdiction of the appropriations subcommittee, how the Panama Canal got in with transportation, I do not know. But it has been my good fortune to chair that subcommittee and to look at the canal revenues and operations from the dollar standpoint over the last several years.

It might be relevant to let the Senate know what the Governor of the Canal Zone said. There was a discussion about deficits. What the Senator from Alaska said over the long haul is technically true about our being able to spend all the money we raise, to suggest that the Panama Canal has always been an in-the-black operation is to deny the facts. As the Governor of the Canal Zone pointed out, this year we are in the black; next year we are going to be in the black; but we ran into a couple of years prior to this time in which we were in the red.

So to suggest that this deficit problem is a new and novel one is not based on the facts as presented by the Governor of the Canal Zone.

The fact of the matter is that the Senator from Utah is accurate. We are going to give up governmental functions. We are no longer going to provide certain specified public services in canal operating and housing areas. But if one talks to the Governor, his primary emphasis is not whether we tell both the Panamanians and the American citizens who are living in the Panama Canal Zone what to do and how to perform the governmental function. If we are concerned about the economics of the situation, the Governor will tell you that that is a losing proposition, that the running of the Government of the Canal Zone costs us money. The revenue comes in from the canal company, which will be maintained in the Commission.

So if you are concerned about how you are going to balance the budget down there, we are getting rid of that part of the operation which has cost us somewhere between $10 and $20 million a year. It is hard to nail that down, because we are going to shift some of those services off to the Department of Defense, and other factors of that nature.

Mr. GARN. Is it not correct, though, that we are going to pay them $10 million a year, at least the first year, to provide those services? You are correct. So that offsets the costs you are talking about. We guarantee them, for 3 years to pay them $10 million. The Comptroller General testified it would only cost $4.4 million, and we are going to subsidize them an additional $5.6 million. That is in the testimony as well.

Mr. BAYH. I was going to deal with that, not from the standpoint of what the Comptroller General said, but from the standpoint of what the Governor of the Canal Zone said, since he appeared before us as a credible witness, and I think that is an accurate assessment. I think he is.

It is important, and I do not say this in a critical sense. If you look through that budget, you see where that money is coming from and where it is going and how we are going to base tolls, and it is very complicated. You need a computer and a crystal ball of some kind.

The Senator from Utah is accurate—we do not know what the long-range view is. Realistically, we can only project to about the year 1984. The Senator from Alaska could suddenly find that all that water and all that land is oil, the likes of which he has been telling me it is going to have, so that we will have more toll revenue from Alaskan oil instead of less.

The Governor was quick to point out that one of the reasons the picture looks more rosy now than it had for the last couple of years is that the revenues have significantly exceeded expectations—by several million dollars. They did that despite the fact that pumping station No. 8 has not been operating, so the Alaskan pipeline has not been providing as much oil by any means as we anticipate in the next several years.

But let me not get involved in that. Let us try to divide what we are talking about, so that at least I can understand it. I do not have a magic formula for understanding it.

As I understand it, we are talking about two entities. We are talking about a governmental operation in which the United States has undertaken, over the past decades, to actually run the governmental functions, the utilities—the water, the electricity, the fire, the police, the garbage collection, providing schools—all those kinds of things that we would normally say are the functions. My good friend from Utah was the mayor of Salt Lake City. He was running the government there. That is what we are doing in the Canal Zone.

The second part is the canal company.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAYH. I yield.

Mr. RIEGLE. If I understand correctly these municipal services that the Senator from Indiana speaks about, the estimate I was given as to the cost to the United States is about $18 million a year. So that, in effect, we transfer these functions from the United States carrying them out, at a cost of about $18 million a year, to the Panamanians doing it for the payment that was referred to earlier, of $10 million. That actually is a saving to the American Government.

Obviously, it may cost the Panamanians more to do it than they would pay by using their own pay rates, and so forth, because there are going to be a certain number of mixed details, and the American pay scales in the zone have been higher than what would normally be Panamanian pay scales outside the zone.

It is important to note that there is information indicating that we have been paying more for the same functions.

Mr. BAYH. I think that I pretty well said about the same thing here just a few moments ago, and I appreciate the Senator adding enforcement to that logic.

Here again I am just relating what was given to us as testimony from the Governor of the Canal Zone yesterday.

If one divides these operations into the governmental operations and the canal operation he will find that the governmental operations are costing us—the Senator from Michigan used the figure of $18 million—we estimated and the Governor estimated yesterday it costs us about $20 million.

Inasmuch as some of those are going to be laid off and will be assumed by the Government of Panama and by the Department of Defense, let me say, the loss will be less than $20 million, but it is somewhere greater than $10 million of losses that the United States has had to pick up every year that we will no longer have to pick up. All right.

Let us look at the other part of the operation, because it is awfully easy to confuse this. The Senator from Utah accurately talks about the annuities. The United States has agreed to pay these annuities. The Government of the United States has agreed to pay Panama for services that they will pick up and provide which are now financed by the United States.

But to suggest that that is going to lead to a loss is to ignore the fact that all of those costs are the basis for determining what the tolls are.

In other words, whatever we have to pay the Panamanians in annuities, $10 million for services, $10 million in fixed annuity, and the other things that are on that list that we have all seen, all of those things are not losses; all of those things are computed and they are charged into whatever the toll revenue shall be.

And I must say I have never run a canal, and I do not want to start now, but it was rather comforting to the Senator from Indiana yesterday to hear the Governor of the Canal Zone say that for the predictable future the Canal Zone will be financially self-sufficient.

It is not going to cost us money, at least so says the Governor of the Canal Zone.

I do not know what the Senator from Utah was referring to, but I here again think it is important for us to understand what we are talking about as to the Government's total outflow to the United States running that government down there. We are going to give that up and give it to the Panamanians, so we are going to save money in that regard.

The question is whether we save $20 or $10 million, or somewhere in between there. We are going to have to pay Panama for assuming some of those services, right, but that cost is not borne by the taxpayers of America. That cost goes into figuring out what the basis for the tolls are and that money will be recouped and recovered every time a ship goes through the canal.

I appreciate the tolerance of my distinguished colleague from Alaska and my friend from Utah. I only yielded to temptation, because of the close proximity and it seems to me the relevance of the testimony of the Panama Canal Zone Governor.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, if I could respond to the Senator, I am sorry the Senator from Alaska has left because he was asking for direct quotes, and I am sorry he is not here, but I would like to at least put in the Record what he was asking for, and again I do not know whether the Governor of the Canal Zone has changed some of his opinions yesterday, but this is his official testimony before the Armed Services Committee so I will quote directly rather than my statements before, paraphrasing what he said:

Now I would like to turn to the proposed Panama Canal treaty. The dominant and all-encompassing change under the treaty is immediate recognition of Panamanian sovereignty and general territorial jurisdiction over the present Canal Zone

• • • More specifically, the treaty would eliminate the Canal Zone Government and the Panama Canal Company and substitute therefor the Panama Canal Commission. This agency will have no authority to perform most governmental or commercial functions.

He goes on on the reduction in facilities:

As of June 30, 1977, the net book value of property, plant, and equipment of the canal enterprise was $567 million.

And I want to emphasize net book value is a bookkeeping term for depreciated assets. It has no relationship to replacement value or to fair market value:

On the effective date of the treaty, an estimated $92 million of these assets will be transferred to Panama and $30 million to other U.S. Government agencies. An additional $4 million in assets will be transferred to Panama during early phases of the treaty. Our current estimate is that the net book value of such property at termination date would amount to $522 million, making the total value of transfers to Panama $618 million.

Then he outlines what has been discussed many times in this Chamber:

The 30-cent per Panama Canal net ton of shipping transiting the canal, the fixed annuity of $10 million, the $10 million for certain specified public services, the additional $10 million that will come out of surplus if there is one.

The point that I wanted to make, and the Senator is correct, if the tolls are sufficient to cover these costs he is talking about, fine. There would be no cost to the American taxpayer, but again I want to quote from the Governor of the Canal Zone:

Summary results for fiscal year 1979 are shown here * * *. Using the most recent estimate of tolls ($195 million), it is projected that there would be $9.3 million earnings without a treaty and a $86.7 million loss with a treaty.

Our analysis has also covered the period fiscal year 1979 through fiscal year 1984 in order to include the total transitional impact as well as the first year effect—in fiscal year 1984—of indexing the payment to Panama for each Panama Canal ton of shipping transiting the Canal. The predicted shortfalls in revenues range from $36.2 million to $58.9 million and are shown on this chart.

That is his conclusion.

Mr. BAYH. Let us go ahead and read the rest of that statement which points out the fact and although I do not think he would tell that committee one thing and our committee another, and that is they do not continue to operate business as usual. They anticipate a 19-percent increase in the tolls which will balance the budget.

Mr. GARN. I was going to go ahead with that.

Mr. BAYH. All right. Fine.

Mr. GARN. That is exactly what he said.

Mr. BAYH. I do not want to tell the Senator from Utah how to debate.

Mr. GARN. Nevertheless, the probability is very high that toll rates will have to be increased often during the next 23 years if the canal is to continue on a self-supporting basis.

Over the longer term, if revenues and costs develop as projected, it appears that periodic toll rate increases will be required, treaty or no.

But here is the difference:

With a treaty, the need is sooner and greater.

That is what he talks about and what the Comptroller General was talking about.

Because of these new financial guarantees of the U.S. tolls will go up more rapidly and sooner.

And let me quote his last statement in his official testimony until 1984 he has no doubts that the toll rates can cover it. But he said:

Nevertheless, I believe you should be alert to the possibility that the Canal operation may not be self-sustaining in the out years.

If I could just follow up with what the Comptroller General says about the same thing where he is talking about the IRA study. He says:

Unfortunately—

This is Elmer Staats testifying—

the IRA study does not analyze the sensitivity of traffic to a two-stage or multistage toll rate increase.

In other words, what he is talking about is some place you reach a point of diminishing returns and he said:

Who would bear the ultimate burden of fulfilling the Treaty obligations to Panama? Since the Treaty calls for Panama to receive benefits from the Canal's existence that it isn't receiving presently, someone or some group would be paying more. U.S. citizens could potentially be affected in two roles: as taxpayers of the country that operates the Canal and guarantees payments to Panama, and as producers and consumers of products shipped through the Canal.

He goes on to point out in dollar terms to be fair this amount is negligible when compared with our total import bill, but nevertheless what the toll rate increases are 30 percent of that increase is going to be paid by U.S. consumers.

His final statement is very similar to the statement of the Governor of the Canal Zone. He says:

If canal transits fall short of what is currently estimated, it is possible that toll revenues will be insufficient to cover the costs of the Commission, including the scheduled payments to Panama. In this eventuality, the U.S. Government is likely to be required to provide financial assistance either through congressional appropriations or by allowing the Commission to borrow from the Treasury.

The whole thing that started this particular debate was the talk about profits and guarantees.

Forgetting the issue of sovereignty, and whether we should or should not turn our backs, just dealing with the economic questions here, I ask the Senator from Indiana why, even if we agree that it should be turned back to them, is it not sufficient to give them a $9.7 billion asset and a lot of other related assets that would go with the canal and its operation? Why is it not fair to say, "We have decided to give it back to you"—again, I do not agree with that, but using that assumption—"but you are going to have to run it as a utility; you make the decisions, you set the tolls, and you run it"?

Why say we are going to give them all that, and then say we are going to give them all this in addition if the tolls do reach a point of diminishing returns, as the Comptroller General and the Governor of the Canal Zone warn us we had better watch out for, beyond 1985?

It is just like owning a house, and then deciding, after so many years, you are going to give it back to the original owner of the land, and you say, "Fine, I am giving it to you, but I am going to guarantee certain payments to you; if the rents are not sufficient, I will guarantee the rents, I will guarantee the taxes, and I will guarantee that, after the year 2000, the mortgage will be paid off."

Why? Why is it not enough to give it to them? Why do we need the guarantee? Why do they not work it like a business or utility, to sink or swim, and take the risk of whether those tolls will be sufficient? Why should the American taxpayer have to pick up those payments?

Mr. BAYH. May I just make one other observation, or perhaps try to reiterate what I have said earlier?

I think that neither the proponents nor the opponents of the canal would be doing justice to the traditional debate process of the U.S. Senate if we did not recognize that there are limits to our ability to predict what actually is going to happen, particularly in the long-range forecasts.

Indeed, the Comptroller General and the Governor of the Canal Zone have said there are certain features that could arise in the future, that could cause, in time, the decreasing use of the canal and the toll problems just suggested by my good friend from Utah.

By the same token, I have not talked with the Comptroller General, but the Governor yesterday said:

There are also other factors that could have a positive impact.

So I would suggest that perhaps the course of wisdom would be to try to examine that timeframe in which we have a reasonable opportunity to determine what is going to happen, and not go looking for the ultimate extremes, either positively or negatively. The Governor of the Canal Zone said yesterday—and I would be glad to have my friend from Utah have a copy of the Record, and perhaps I should ask unanimous consent that significant relevant portions of it be put into the Record as soon as it is available, if there are no objections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Stone). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAYH. But I was very concerned about the economics and so we zeroed in on it. The Senator from New Jersey was there and contributed to this dialog—our distinguished colleague who is the ranking Republican member of this committee. The Governor said repeatedly that in the time frame in which one could predict, between now and 1982, the canal could be made self-sufficient and the taxpayers of the United States would not have to be paying for it.

I just want to go back here again to what we are really talking about; hopefully we are not confusing apples and oranges, because the fact of the annuities has come up two or three times.

We are talking about an agreement in the treaties that would provide for a $10 million flat use payment to Panama. We are talking about payment for services, and we are talking about a number of other cost factors which are not now decided but which will be decided as a result of a legislative program that will be given to us by the President, which will consider other factors that will be written off against tolls.

One factor that I think is important to get in there is the right kind of depreciation on assets. The Senator was concerned about that, and I think it only makes sense that those assets are there, they are in the Canal Zone, let us depreciate those so that the depreciation of the assets goes into the toll base, so that when a lock suddenly needs to be repaired, for example, you have the money there, through the actuarial process, to restore that.

All of those factors are present, and I think it is important for Congress to stand up and make sure those factors are defined in a way that is fair to the United States, and I think the dialog with the Governor yesterday took that into consideration.

All those factors should go into the cost of running the canal, which would then be prorated against each ton that is going to go through there. Now, if there is a surplus—first let me say, the toll basis, the toll fee is supposed to be, and efforts will be made to try to set it, at a level so we come out at zero, so we do not have any losses or we do not have any surpluses.

If there is a surplus, as we have now—this year there was a surplus, where the revenues were greater than had been anticipated—if that condition exists, then there is another payment that goes to Panama, not to exceed $10 million. I think it is important for us not to confuse that payment, which only exists if there is a surplus, with the other $10 million, which is a basis for determining what the total value would be.

I am sure I have said more—I know I have said more than I intended to, but let me just say a couple more words? Because if we are looking at the economics, and to me the economics are important, I suggest perhaps—

Mr. GARN. Could I just ask the Senator one question?

Mr. BAYH. Please.

Mr. GARN. The Senator brought up the implementing legislation, and I think he is absolutely right; we ought to see that implementing legislation. As a matter of fact, regardless of who is on which side of this issue, it seems to me that we should not have even started considering the treaties until we had that implementing legislation before us, so that we would not be arguing about some of these possibilities that we do not yet know.

I think it is important to note that the State Department told us that they would have the implementing legislation before us in October, and we had the chief counsel, Mr. Hansell, before us in Armed Services, and he said they would continue to rush, but there were so many things that were difficult to interpret in the treaties that it was difficult for them to write the implementing legislation.

Comptroller General Staats said he could not estimate all the treaty-related costs; he does not really know how much it is going to cost the American taxpayer in total treaty-related costs, because that information is not available.

I agree with you; we are going to take a look at that implementing legislation. I think it would have been helpful to this debate if we had actually had that legislation, to know what it is going to contain and what the cost associated with it are, before we had this debate on the treaty.

Mr. BAYH. Let me say I am going to join with my friend from Utah. We are not going to let the Comptroller General write that legislation. Let us look at what we have to do here in the Senate.

Mr. GARN. It is the State Department that is going to send it up, not the Comptroller General.

Mr. BAYH. I understand. But there is nothing in the treaties that tells us what we have to do in that implementing legislation. The two stand on their own legs; and once the treaty is ratified, when you and I and other Senators have voted for the treaty or against the treaty, then we will have the responsibility of looking at this and saying, "OK, this is what the treaty says and this is what we envision as being financially true, so that our taxpayers do not have to bear the burden and we in Congress, together with the people of the United States, can write that implementing legislation, and I assume that both the proponents and the opponents will be able to do a good job.

Mr. GARN. The only problem with that—I agree with the Senator from Indiana that we will have to write it. The only thing is, there are a lot of things that will have to be done, that we will have no discretion on. For example, the transfer of 2,100 employees to the Department of Defense payroll. There is a prediction here that 20 or 25 percent of all Canal Zone employees will have to be taken out of the Canal Zone within 5 years. There are some phases of that implementing legislation that will greatly affect the cost. We are going to have to take care of that 20 percent of American employees, one way or the other. We will have to take care of the American school teachers, and so on. That is where we get this estimate of about $1 billion over the 22 years: the cost for these indirect treaty-related items.

But I still have not received an answer from the distinguished Senator from South Dakota or Indiana to the question which started this whole colloquy. I am seeking an answer. Hypothetically, I agree if they are entitled to this money why should they not bear the risk of the sensitivity of the zone.

The Senator is correct. These are estimates. The traffic may not drop off. The toll rate increases may not reach the point of diminishing returns. It may be self-sustaining to the year 2000. But the financial experts say beyond the year 1984 they are concerned about that. I am sure the Governor told the Senators that. Beyond 1984 they are not sure.

After giving this $9.7 billion asset to them, why should not the taxpayers of Panama bear the risk of the tolls dropping off? That is the question that started it off. Why should the American taxpayers take that risk and Panama have no risk at all?

I would like someone to give me a business and say, "Mr. Garn, we are going to give it to you debt free, no mortgage, no interest to be paid, and you can charge whatever you want for your products. If you charge too much and your sales drop off, we are going to guarantee you a payment anyway."

I do not understand the economics of that, that we have to bear the burden of a possible future risk, rather than the people we are giving this asset to. I cannot comprehend why it is placed on the American taxpayer rather than Torrijos.

Mr. McGOVERN. Will the Senator let me attempt to answer?

Mr. GARN. I would like someone to attempt to.

Mr. BAYH. Let me complete one thought, if I may I want to get back to the fact that got me involved in this debate. We talked about what the Governor of the Canal Zone said. He said that in the short-range it would be made self-sustaining. We all know that there can be things that happen, good or bad, that would change that equation in the future.

Let me suggest, before I yield the floor, that one of the reasons I determined to support this treaty after a great deal of thinking and struggling in my own mind was—because if I had my druthers, it would be why change things, it has worked pretty well—one of the things which compelled me was just as we right now are discussing the unpredictability of costs for running the canal under a treaty.

I think we can understand that there are some significantly higher unpredictable costs of greater dimensions of continuing to run the Panama Canal as it is right now. Some say it is fair to say, "Well, suppose you do not ship as much oil through there? It is not going to make it possible to get higher tolls in the treaty." I think it is just as fair and responsible for us to say, "If we do not get a treaty, we better figure out how much it will cost to have 100,000 American boys down there, some of whom will not come back."

That is one of the costs that we hope we will not have to confront, and that is one of the major concerns to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. GARN. If I may respond to the Senator, I have said here on the floor, though maybe not in his presence, that those people should not assume that those of us who oppose this treaty oppose any treaty. I am not one who believes we should continue on with the status quo. I do not believe many of my colleagues do, either. We believe there should be significant modifications in the 1903 treaty. To avoid the kind of a situation the Senator was talking about, I will not get involved in the military side today as it will take too long. I will address at some other time how vulnerable the canal is. Nevertheless, whatever the military implications are, suppose we defeat this treaty in the Senate? Why does everyone assume that this is the end, that it is over, that there is a big confrontation and no place to go? I would certainly hope that if we are successful in defeating this treaty—

Mr. BAYH. Does the Senator know how long we have been negotiating this treaty?

Mr. GARN. Yes; off and on for 13 or 14 years. But I would hope that after having been down there and recognizing how badly Torrijos needs a treaty for his own political survival, and how important politically it is to the President of the United States and this country, that we would go back and say, "Hey, this is not the end. We are still willing to talk. Let us start immediately and work on something that is fair to both countries."

I think it is interesting that a lot of people, citizens who were in favor of the treaty, of the principle of returning sovereignty, when they found out these details of economics and defense told me:

Although we are in favor of giving it back, we had no idea these were the terms for giving it back. We think you ought to go back and negotiate something that is fair to both sides.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GARN. In a moment.

Let us not assume that if we defeat it we have an armed conflict. As reasonable people, we would say, "We did not make it on the first round, let us go back and talk some more and see what we can work out."

That would be a more responsible position than to say, "Well, it is dead. Let us have a war."

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. GARN. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. RIEGLE. I think the question of what happens if the treaties are turned down is a really powerful and important question. It involves trying to look into the future, and that is not an easy thing to do. Having been to Panama and having talked to opposition groups in Panama, those to the left of Torrijos and those to the right of Torrijos, I have not talked to anybody in Panama who said if there had to be a new negotiation they would not insist on a better deal from the Panamanian point of view.

It seems to me that if we listen to what the Senator is saying, if the United States turns down these treaties and the United States goes back for however long, 6 months, 6 years, 12 years, and negotiates a new treaty, that should not cause us to assume that we would come back at a later time with a package more favorable to the United States. I would assume just the reverse of that.

Frankly, I do not think if we went back and negotiated we would necessarily get the Panamanian people, 66 percent of them as in the referendum, to agree to a transition period as long as 22 years.

On what basis does the Senator think we would not be facing a worse situation after those negotiations?

(Mr. Allen assumed the chair.)

Mr. GARN. I would be happy to respond. I was there for 5 days and I made it a point to talk to a lot of private citizens. I thought the reactions were rather interesting.

We have heard about all this anti-American, antigringo talk, and yet almost every Panamanian citizen I talked to on the streets of Colon, Panama City, and Balboa wanted to assure me that they were not anti-American, not to fear any great uprising, they liked us, they appreciated what we had done for them, they appreciated what had been done for their economy as a result of the canal being down there.

I said, "OK, did you vote for or against it?"

Everyone I talked to had voted for it. I am not talking about large numbers—between 20 and 25. I do not know exactly.

They said:

We voted for the treaty because we are Panamanians. We believe in our country as you believe in yours, and we would like to have the canal back in our jurisdiction.

It was amazing how they said:

We are afraid of our operation under the dictatorship. We would prefer to work out some kind of a lease arrangement, some way that you would run it for us.

I was surprised. I am not arguing that none of them said they did not want it back. They did, but they were seeking some guarantees that it would be run efficiently and well.

Those who voted against it, interestingly enough, said the same thing, that they wanted the canal back. They did not vote against it because of not being patriotic or nationalistic, but they did not want it back under Torrijos. If they had it back under a democratic government, where they would have control as voters over the operations of the canal and their public officials, then they would have voted for the treaty.

Mr. RIEGLE. That is exactly my point, if the Senator will yield. If these treaties are turned down and this causes an uprising in Panama, if Torrijos is ousted and somebody else takes power and we then undertake to start negotiating again with whoever the new government is, it seems to me the Senator just made the very arguments which were the ones I heard. That is, that the rest of the people in Panama, if they have to negotiate a new deal, want to negotiate an even better one from their point of view than the one we are considering here now. I should think that they would advance that as an argument to say, why should there be a 22-year phased transition; why not make it 5 years? Why not make it 7 or 8 years?

I heard a number of Panamanians say that, and I suspect the Senator may have, too, if one assumes Torrijos is out of the picture.

Mr. GARN. I make the point, or the assumption, just the opposite way, to refute the Senator's point. I believe they would be willing to reconsider, because the paramount issue for them was getting the canal back under their control. As far as the operation and maintenance and everything, that is not what they were fighting about. So I would not assume, when they are getting sovereignty back immediately—that is what I tried to point out earlier about this 22-year period: All they are doing is trying to operate the canal for 22 years. They take over the whole canal zone, under their police, under their courts, under their government. That was the overriding issue, not the individual terms of the treaty.

If we went back and said, we are going to renegotiate all of these, I am not convinced that they would ask for a better deal on those terms.

Mr. RIEGLE. I might just say that I do not believe it is completely correct to say that is all that is involved. We, in fact, as the Senator says, manage to run the canal for 22 years. We also keep our military bases there, too. That is an enormous additional part of the bargain.

In terms of running the canal, 80 percent of the jobs on the canal today are manned by Panamanians. So if we were to have 100 percent of the employees operating the canal being Panamanian, we would only have to have them move into the additional 20 percent of the jobs that they do not already have.

I heard many Panamanians say to me, regardless of where they were philosophically, that they felt they were ready to assume control of this canal much sooner than 22 years. Quite frankly, I think our negotiators were very effective, from the point of view of the United States, in persuading Panama to accept a transition period that is that long when, right today, 80 percent of the jobs in the canal are held and carried on by Panamanian citizens.

Mr. GARN. Did the Senator ask the Panamanian employees how they felt about the treaty? The ones I talked to, 12 or 13—and I picked them out at random—each said that they voted against the treaties, they were opposed to the treaties, because they trusted our Government; they do not trust their own.

The point I am trying to make is that I do not have any doubts that the Panamanians can run it from an operational standpoint. There are some very bright people down there. Torrijos, as low level as he is in intelligence, has cabinet ministers who are very smart fellows. I talked to Mr. Barletta at great length. He has a Ph. D., University of Chicago, is minister of finance. I spent a lot of time talking to the minister of finance and the education minister.

I do not argue that they cannot run the canal. Their problem is political interference. That is what the Panamanian citizens were telling me, not that they were not ready to operate it or run it from a mechanical, physical standpoint. They do not trust their Government. They have a dictator who overthrew an elected established government.

Let me give an example. I told Torrijos this personally.

For $65 million a year are used for operation and maintenance of the canal, for slides, locks, et cetera. I said to Torrijos, "Do you think that whoever is around in the year 2000, with all the social and economic problems in this country, will be able to keep their hands out of that maintenance fund?"

It does not have to be a dictatorship where you have absolute total dictatorship. He can do what he wants. He cut the equation fund for students in half on the streets of Colon because somebody complained. He did it by snapping his fingers. There are no checks and balances from Congress. His education minister was aghast.

When I was mayor of Salt Lake City, we had a general fund. It came out of property tax revenues. We had an airport facility that ran out of its landing fees. We had a water facility that was self-sufficient, totally run by taxpayers' money from water revenues. The point I make is that every single year, we were required by the State constitution to balance the budget. The mayor has always balanced the budget in Salt Lake City, because mayors go to jail if they do not. It is that specific. So every year, we balanced the budget.

But there was always the pressure from our city council, the city commissioners because, with inflation, we always had more expenditures than we were going to have revenue. The first suggestion was always, let us be politically popular and not raise the property tax, but how about another million or two out of the water facility or the airport fund? Let us rob Peter to pay Paul. I was able successfully to keep that down and say, no. Let us keep those separate.

If there is that temptation in a well-run American city with democratically elected officials who are required by a constitution to balance the budget, do you think that a dictator who has severe housing problems, severe economic problems in his country, will not be tempted to say, "Let me take $10 million of that $65 million next year; we will defer fixing this lock or repairing this water line and use it to buy housing."? That is a worthy purpose.

So I do not doubt the Panamanians' ability to run the canal. I doubt the political ability of that Government to run it properly. Both opponents and proponents among Panamanian citizens told me they were worried about that fact.

Mr. RIEGLE. I think the maintenance question is an important factor, one that has to be looked at. But it has to be looked at in the context of the fact that it is going to be the United States that makes the maintenance decisions for the next 22 years.

We are talking about what kind of government, who will head it, and whether it will be Torrijos or somebody else. It really is beyond my imagination to expect that in the year 2000, 22 years from now, when the United States stops running the canal and making the maintenance decisions, Torrijos is going to be around. I do not think any of us can forecast what the domestic situation is going to be in Panama at that time in terms of what the pressures might be or the form of that government or who will be in it or what have you. I do not think we can use that issue today to say that that rules out the wisdom of passing the treaties at this time. So I think that question of who is around in the year 2000 is one that no one has the answer to.

Mr. GARN. It might be Colonel Noriega, and he would be worse than Torrijos.

Mr. RIEGLE. I think the key point that we have to look at here is the question, from the point of view of Panama, that their whole reputation internationally will depend upon the degree to which they can demonstrate a capacity to accept the responsibility for managing and operating the canal. Let us take ourselves forward to the year 2000.

It would seem to me that the one way that Panama will be measured by every other nation—their immediate neighbors, the rest of the countries in South America, the United States, the rest of the world—will be on the basis on which they responsibly, ably, and wisely manage the canal. I think they understand it. I think they understand it today, let alone having 22 more years elapse.

It would be my thought that, knowing that, and having the canal be something that all the nations of the world use, Panama would put premier attention and emphasis and talent to work to make sure that if they did one thing right, they would manage the canal right.

As the Senator himself said, he has every confidence that the Panamanians have the capacity, even today, to run the canal. They run 80 percent of the canal at the moment, in terms of the on-line jobs there. I think they possess those talents.

Twenty-two years' time, it seems to me, is certainly more than enough, in terms of a reasonable transition time, for them to be able to assume the full management and operation and control of this facility.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. GARN. I hope the Senator is correct in that feeling. I do not share his optimism that that will take place.

We have been on this a long time. The Senator from South Dakota has been patiently waiting. I yield to him at this time.

Mr. MCGOVERN. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. President, I want to talk about a different matter.

I have been listening to this discussion with regard to the possible dollar cost to the American taxpayer if we miscalculate how high the tolls should be over the next 22 years while we continue to operate this canal. As I understand Senator Garn's argument, what he is saying is that, under the terms of the treaty, between now and the year 2000, during which time the United States will continue to operate the canal and will continue to set the toll rates which provide the revenues for the canal, if through some miscalculation, the cost of operating that canal during this period while the United States is operating it turns out to be higher than the revenue from the tolls, we have to make up the difference at the end of the 22-year period so that we do not give Panama, at that point, a canal with encumbrances against it. That in fact, is what the treaty says. The Senator is right about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGovern) will indulge the Chair for just a moment, Mr. Gravel had the floor at the time he left the Chamber and the Chair has not subsequently recognized the Senator, even though the distinguished Senator from Utah did take the floor, and—

Mr. MCGOVERN. Will the Chair now recognize me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER [continuing]. A moment ago yielded to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota.

The Chair at this time would like to recognize the distinguished Senator from South Dakota in his own right, and he does so recognize the Senator.

Mr. McGOVERN. I thank the Chair, and I do prefer, as a matter of fact, to speak in my own right.

The point that the Senator from Utah makes, as I said, is correct.

But I presume that even under the present operation of the canal, with or without this treaty, if we have people running it who are not sufficiently capable to evaluate the cost of that operation and then set the tolls accordingly, that somebody is going to have to make up the difference, and that would have to be the U.S. Government as matters now stand.

So I do not really see what we are arguing here as far as the next 22-year period is concerned. The only question is whether we have enough confidence in the Americans who are going to continue to operate this canal for the next 22 years to assume they will continue to do a reasonably responsible job and will know enough to set the tolls at a level where we do not lose money on the canal.

We are not sacrificing until the year 2000 our authority to set the toll rates. That is an American right. It is in American hands.

Now, I grant that there is always a human possibility of error. It is always possible that whoever is managing this canal may not set the rates exactly right. That is true with other businesses. Every once in a while a business will estimate its income at a higher level than it turns out to be and it has a shortfall. But I presume we are talking here, even at worst, of a few million dollars.

What I was hopeful we could do here for a little while this afternoon is to look at some of the costs that might fall on the United States and on the——

Mr. GARN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGOVERN. If I could finish first.

What I want to think about for a few minutes is what it might cost, since we are dealing with speculative matters here today, I think the Senator from Utah would agree that the case he has posed is something that might happen, a possibility that there might be a miscalculation involving a few million dollars, some year, that would have to be made up.

But while we are in that frame of mind, I want us to think about the potential costs to the United States of rejecting these treaties.

In other words, why is it that the last six Presidents of the United States, three Democrats and three Republicans, have thought it was in the national interest of the United States to negotiate a new treaty?

Why have the Joint Chiefs of Staff who are responsible for the defense of the canal both under the present treaty and under the one we are now debating—and they will be in perpetuity as long as this new treaty we are now debating is in effect, we have a joint responsibility with Panama for the defense of that canal—why is it that our Joint Chiefs unanimously say that their job of keeping that canal open and operating peacefully is better under the treaty we are now debating than it is under the old 1903 treaty?

I think it is because these men have looked ahead to what the potential costs are, and I am talking about financial costs, I am talking about foreign policy costs, I am talking about political costs, I am talking about the possible loss of life on which it is very difficult to put a dollar sign.

Can we think for a moment about those costs?

Now, before I proceed any further, since the Senator yielded to me, I want to show him the courtesy of yielding to him.

Mr. GARN. I thank the Senator. I want to respond very briefly.

The Senator posed the question, he did not see much difference because the taxpayers were involved now if there were losses.

That is correct, if we did not have a treaty change.

The reason it is more likely to fall back under the new treaty is because of these enormously increased payments to Panama. That is the essence of the testimony, that the first year we would have a $9.3 million profit under the present operation, but we would go to a $36.7 million loss.

That is the question I really posed, and under the financial terms of the treaty, and the Governor testifies, the tolls would have to go up, in any event, but higher and more rapidly under the terms of the treaty.

That is my question.

Why does the United States have to assume that new risk rather than the Panamanians?

Mr. McGOVERN. My understanding is that it is in payment for services that will derive to the American personnel and to the United States during that 22-year period when we continue to operate the canal.

Mr. GARN. Part of it is, but not all.

Mr. McGOVERN. And on the Senator's point here earlier about wishing we had the implementing legislation before us and that the State Department would hurry this legislation to the Capitol, I am not all that sure that that is the kind of doctrine we want to be expounding here on the Senate floor.

After all, we are the legislative branch. We do not have to depend on the State Department to draft implementing legislation, or legislation of any other kind.

I realize that, as a practical matter, when we mark up a foreign aid bill, or a State Department authorization bill of some kind, we usually do, in fact, sit back and wait until they have drafted a bill and persuaded some Senator to introduce it.

But that is not the way the Constitution intended it. The Constitution designates us as the lawmaking branch of the Government, and in the final analysis we cannot pass off on the State Department the terms of this implementing legislation. That is our obligation.

So I will join with the Senator when the time comes in offering my input along with his and other Senators as to how these implementing laws are to be discussed and what they ought to contain.

But, for the moment, what we are debating here is whether or not it is in the interest of the United States to move ahead with the ratification of these treaties. Since there has been so much discussion on this floor the last few days, most of which I have listened to either here on the floor or over the radio, it strikes me that the time has come for us to have a little more consideration of what the cost might be to us if we reject these treaties.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MCGOVERN. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank my distinguished friend.

A little bit earlier he made reference to the opinion expressed by the members of the Joint Staff of the various branches of the military, and that opinion indicated that they favored the treaties and that it would be better down the road for our country.

Here is a problem that bothers the Senator from Nebraska. I have observed that many high-ranking officers in our Armed Forces, all branches, who are still on active duty, subject to the commands of their Commander in Chief, some of them perhaps having hopes in their breasts of further promotions and further office, for the most part have supported the treaty and made optimistic predictions about the future if the treaties are adopted. On the other hand, the number of high-ranking officers who have retired and who have expressed grave concern about the wisdom of ratifying the treaties are legion. Why has all that happened?

Mr. MCGOVERN. I say to the Senator, first of all, that I would tend to place more reliability on the testimony of military commanders who are in office and have the responsibility for defending this country than I would an ex-military officer who has no obligation at all for the defense of this country. He has his right to speak out as a private citizen. However, it is my judgment, and I think the Senator would have to agree with this, that these retired officers have not been in the same position, have not had the same opportunity, as have our Joint Chiefs, who have followed these negotiations from the beginning.

I think that Senator is aware of the fact that some of the provisions of this treaty actually were drafted in the Pentagon. They were cleared, of course, by our negotiators.

The implication of the Senator's question is a very serious one, which is that the highest military commanders in this Government would deliberately slant their answers in order to keep open the possibilities for promotion.

Let me read the answer of General Brown, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to that question, in testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee on September 26. Senator Clark raised the very point that the Senator from Nebraska has now raised. I quote Senator Clark, speaking to the Joint Chiefs. He said:

Gentlemen, some of the most bitter critics of the treaty say that those of you in the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the higher ranks of the military commander are supporting this treaty in fear of maintaining or enhancing your positions. They say that you are being intimidated. What is your response to these accusations?

This is what General Brown had to say—Chairman of the Joint Chiefs:

Senator, I just turned to Secretary Brown to ask if he would mind if I made an unsolicited statement at some point to get this on the record. I thank you for your question. The rules are quite clear and I think understood by all of us that nobody, no senior officer in uniform will remain on active duty and publicly be critical of a Presidential decision. I, in my role as chairman, and other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff will articulate as forcefully and as logically as we can the view the Joint Chiefs of Staff hold on issues of national security, but if the judgment goes against us as it does in many cases, there is nothing in the law that says the President has to accept our advice, but we have to give it.

We don't go public without leaving active duty first in doing so. However, the rules are also quite clear that in response to interrogation before a congressional committee that we answer fully and factually. The public record is quite clear where we have been in opposition to a Presidential decision. I can cite two cases. One, and I am sure this comes as no surprise, was the B-1.

I think the Senator will recall that military commanders spoke out in favor of the B-1 even at a time when the President of the United States was on the other side of the issue.

I continue reading:

The second was in January, the Joint Chiefs of Staff urged that the President not plan to withdraw the 2nd U.S. Division from Korea unless three things were made part of that program. One was that the drawdown be done in such a manner that the military balance on the peninsula not be disturbed. Second, that we make public a pledge of our continued support of the Mutual Security Treaty with the Republic of Korea, and third, that we remain a Pacific power. Those three conditions the President accepted, and it became part of his program, at which point the Joint Chiefs of Staff endorsed the program.

He goes on to say that they were overruled on that point. Then he concludes:

So, it is wrong to say that in the case of the Panama Canal we are doing this only because a decision has been made. I have personally worked very diligently for 4 years to achieve these treaties with Ambassador Bunker and subsequently with Ambassador Linowitz.

At that point, Secretary Brown entered the dialog, and he said:

Senators, there is nothing that is more offensive or insulting to military commanders than to imply that they would lie as to their real feelings to a congressional committee in order to buck for a promotion.

I believe that to be the case. If these men are honorable in retirement, they are just as honorable on active duty, in my judgment, and more so at a time when the only oath they take is to uphold the Constitution and the well-being of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will yield further—and I appreciate his indulgence very much—perhaps I spoke unwisely when I made reference to a desire for promotion. Certainly, I would not want to intimate at all that officers in any position, retired or active, would tell untruths, would lie to us. But I believe this is a true statement of the facts.

Mr. McGOVERN. On that point, I think the Senator is aware that General Brown cannot be promoted any higher, so he cannot buck for any more promotions.

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I say. Perhaps I was even unwise in referring to promotions. But I think this is true. I think it is the nature of a soldier on duty to obey the higher commands. It is in the tradition in the military that after a decision is arrived at as to national policy, they go along.

I also believe that once someone is retired, they perhaps, for the first time in their lives, become free to speak as they see, and these individuals are some of the most dedicated, patriotic people. They have nothing to gain but to promote the welfare of the country they have served so long. Yet, they are absolutely free to speak, because they are not a part of a great military that, by tradition, by practice, and oftentimes for very good reason, goes along with a policy after it is made.

Many of those officers have served in the Canal Zone, many are familiar with all the matters in the countries south of the border, and many of them have strong and deep feelings that this treaty is a mistake.

So, without impugning anybody's motives and without charging that some are trying to advance themselves—and I withdraw anything I said that implied that—and without implying that anyone is telling an untruth, I think we are faced with a real fact here: that the vast majority of knowledgeable, dedicated, patriotic military leaders who are now retired, and thus free to express an opinion of deep feeling as they see the welfare of this country, are greatly opposed to the treaties.

I believe that we, as legislators and as the Senate considering this treaty, must take that into account and give great weight to the opinion of these dedicated men, who feel that we are making a misposited to these treaties.

Mr. McGOVERN. I do not disagree with the Senator from Nebraska that they have a right to be heard, that their opinions should be evaluated, and they have been. These retired officers have been given every chance to testify, both before the Armed Services Committee and before the Foreign Relations Committee. They are free to go public with their statements. They can lecture across the country, as they have.

However, in the final analysis, when we make decisions that affect the security of this country, I think we are better advised to go to the officers who have responsibility today, the ones who are charged with the defense of this country, rather than to turn to those who are out of Government service, who are away from the exposure of the negotiations that are now going on, who obviously have not been taken in on all the discussions that have led to these treaties.

There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that these officers—the Chief of Naval Operations; the Army Chief of Staff; the Air Force Chief of Staff; General McAuliffe, who is currently in command of the Southern Command, which includes Panama—are speaking what they honestly believe to be in the best interests of this country.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator.

[Mr. Zorinsky assumed the chair.]

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the distinguished Senator, my good friend from South Dakota.

I just must take issue with the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska which gives the impression that all retired generals and admirals are opposed to the treaty and only those who are on active duty support it.

That is not the case. I am quite certain that we can call upon a roster of retired generals and admirals who have spoken up for the treaties that is every bit as impressive as the roster that could be presented on the other side.

Let me give you a few examples of those distinguished military leaders now retired who could not possibly be under any kind of restraint who have vigorously endorsed the treaties. They include Gen-Maxwell D. Taylor, who was formerly a Chief of Staff of our Armed Forces; Gen. M. B. Ridgway, who commanded American Forces in Korea during the Korean War; Adm. E. R. Zumwalt, former Chief of Naval Operations; Gen. W. C. Westmoreland, the commanding officer of the American Army in Vietnam; Gen.

Lucius D. Clay, a renowned American general in charge of American Forces in Italy during the Second World War; Gen. Lauris Norstad, of the Air Force, who was not only the commanding general of our Air Force but went on to be the commanding general of NATO forces in Europe.

I cannot think of a more impressive list of retired generals and admirals than those who I have just named, all of whom vigorously support these treaties.

So, I thought that we ought not to let the record stand in a form that would suggest that only active generals and admirals endorse the treaty while those who have retired do not.

Mr. McGOVERN. I thank the Senator from Idaho for that very helpful intervention because he has very properly reminded us that a number of distinguished retired generals and admirals have supported these proposed treaties.

In that connection, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from General Ridgway, the Army Chief of Staff during the Korean War, dated August 13, 1977, to Senator Sparkman, be printed in the Record, together with the supporting statement by General Ridgway.

There being no objection, the letters and statement were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., January 3, 1977.

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: Because of my fifty years of participation in high-level US-Latin American relations, I hope you will read the enclosure. It sets forth my Latin-American experience, my reasons for strongly supporting ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties, and my hope that after full debate, with such clarifications as the Senate may deem essential, it will approve and advise ratification.

With kindest personal regards and my highest respect,

Sincerely,

M. B. RIDGWAY.

JANUARY 10, 1978.

Gen. M. B. RIDGWAY,
Waldheim Road W., Fox Chapel,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

DEAR GENERAL RIDGWAY: Many thanks for your letter and enclosures of January 3 in support of the proposed Panama Canal treaties.

I very much appreciate having your views on this very controversial matter and you may be sure that I intend to share your letter with my colleagues on the Committee and in the Senate as a whole.

When the Committee gets around to reaching a final decision on the pending treaties, I will be sure to keep your thoughts and comments in mind.

Sincerely,

JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman.

MEMO—PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

1. FACTS BEARING ON THE SUBJECT AS I SEE THEM

a. During WW I we had the full cooperation of all of Latin-America, except for the Argentine.

b. During WW II we had complete political, military, and economic cooperation from all of Latin-America, except initially from the Argentine, and this we retained throughout a decade and more following the war.

c. If we should become involved in another major war, then the importance of a friendly cooperative Latin-America would be of vital strategic importance to us, and to secure and retain it should be a major objective of our foreign policy.

d. Currently, our relations with Latin-America have become marred by serious disagreements, such as those with Brazil (our oldest and firmest friend in the Hemisphere), Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Panama, and Peru, with some knotty problems with Mexico, while Cuba remains strongly aligned with the USSR.

e. The governments of the Latin-American Republics are unanimously in support of Panama on the Canal issue.

f. The situation in Panama is one made to order for demagogues and all those elements inherently hostile to the United States.

g. Panama itself has the potential for arousing strong anti-U.S. feelings; of facing us with dangerous rioting; and, depending on how such a situation were handled, of turning much, if not all of Latin-America from friendly allies to neutrals, or worse.

h. It therefore becomes of major importance to us to defuse this potential time-bomb, and ratification of the treaties would, I think, be most effective in doing this.

i. The vulnerability of the Canal to sabotage is greater today than ever with the availability of nuclear explosives, but even breaching the earth fill at Caño Saddle would drain Gatun Lake, rendering the Canal useless for at least the three years it would take Nature to refill it after the break were replaced.

j. The U.S. Senate will give full consideration to reconciling the divergence of views on the two provisions dealing with our "rights" of priority of passage in war or emergencies, and of our use of armed force for its protection. I believe these obstacles can and will be surmounted.

2. CONCLUSIONS

I fully recognize the great weight and divisive nature of the arguments of those who oppose ratification, but I firmly believe that these arguments are outweighed by our long range vital strategic interests, and when the U.S. Senate has thoroughly debated the issues, I would strongly urge and hope that it would approve and advise ratification.

See Attachment hereto.

M. B. RIDGWAY,
General, U.S. Army, Retired.

ATTACHMENT TO MY MEMO OF SAME DATE—PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

My judgment on the issue of ratification derives from fifty years of experience involving high-level U.S.-Latin American relations, as listed below:

1. 1927-28, Asst Secretary, Nicaraguan National Board of Elections.
2. 1930, Secretary of that Board.
3. 1932, lecturer in Spanish to the Panamanian Police, Balboa.
4. 1939, with General George C. Marshall on his mission to Brazil, negotiating an agreement for establishing our line of communications across the South Atlantic from Natal via Ascension Island to Accra and Dakar.
5. 1940, Organized the U.S. Staff of the Mexican-United States Military Commission.
6. 1940-41, under State Department supervision, organized US Army officer teams to negotiate with all of the Latin-American governments for their military cooperation, and personally conducted those negotiations with Colombia and Venezuela.
7. 1941-42, Chief, Latin-American Section, War Plans Division, Army General Staff.
8. 1947, member of the U.S. Delegation to the Rio Conference.
9. 1948, member of the U.S. Delegation to the Bogota Conference.
10. 1946-48, Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board, consisting of the military representatives of all 21 American Republics.
11. 1948-49, Commander-in-Chief, Caribbean Command, when the Governor of the Canal Zone was under the military commander, and this command was responsible for most of U.S. military activities throughout Latin America.
12. 1949-50, again Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board until ordered to take command of the US Eighth Army and the ROK Army in Korea.
13. Have traveled extensively throughout those fifty years in South and Central America and the Caribbean.
14. Have been decorated in years past by the Governments of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Mexico, Panama, and Peru. Acceptance and retention of all these decorations was authorized by our Government.

M. B. RIDGWAY,
U.S. Army, Retired.

Mr. McGOVERN. I think General Ridgway's arguments always carry special weight with me because he is the general way back in 1954 who, at a time when it had been proposed by some in the administration that we intervene in Vietnam militarily, advised President Eisenhower against that with such force that he thought he had carried the day, and General Ridgway writes in his memoirs that when he faces his Maker some day the thing he will be proudest of is that he persuaded the United States not to send American forces into Vietnam. Unfortunately, the general wrote those memoirs in 1956 and, of course, we all know what happened after he left as Army Chief of Staff and others took over and we went right down the road that he warned us in 1954 would lead to disaster.

And it is that disastrous road that I want to talk about here momentarily. But I yield to Senator Garn at his request.

Mr. GARN. I thank the distinguished Senator from South Dakota for being so patient. He has tried for a half-hour now to get his statement out. The Senator from Idaho is correct. There are some very distinguished retired military officers who do support this treaty. He stated it accurately, and there are some distinguished officers.

I would just point out, though, that in a poll, and it is not current—it was some 3 weeks ago, so I do not know what has come in since—but a poll was conducted of over 300 retired general and flag officers, and at that point there were about 307 opposed and 6 in favor.

When Admiral Holloway was testifying before the Armed Services Committee I questioned him on this and he said much as the proponents have said that, well, the Joint Chiefs of Staff had the responsibility, and therefore that would make some difference. So I want to be fair about the testimony. But I asked him. I said: "Admiral, what do you think a poll of active duty flag and general officers would show, not reservists who are off, if it were held secretly?" And he commented that he thought it would be about the same. However, he wanted to put in one caveat, again to be fair so that I am not taking something out of context, that the others did not have the direct responsibility and access to the same information that he and the Joint Chiefs of Staff did. So he did put those caveats in.

Mr. CHURCH. Which are very important caveats.

Mr. GARN. They are and, that is why I want to be fair and not quote something out of context, but nevertheless he said that if it were held in secret he would expect the ratio would be about the same of active duty general and flag officers.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGOVERN. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I know the Senator from Utah wants to be wholly objective and fair. He has referred to a poll and the results of a poll. I presume that it was the poll taken by the Retired Reserve Officers Association of the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. GARN. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. My presumption, the Senator nods, is correct.

Let me read the question that was asked to these Reserve officers just to give you some flavor of how this poll was tilted.

The question that was asked, a solicitation really for opposition to the treaty, which is hardly the form that an objective and fair poll normally takes, solicitation reads as follows:

I concur with your opposition to the treaty concerning the Canal Zone to be brought before the U.S. Senate for ratification at an early date. I am willing to join Admirals Moorer, Burke, and a great many other senior members of the Reserve Officers Association in publicly expressing my disapproval of the treaty in the belief it is not in the best interest of the people of the United States.

That is the poll. It is kind of like a Russian election. You get to put your signature down in opposition. I do not see a place here for expressing your approval.

Moreover, just in order to be wholly objective and fair in the presentation of these figures, I think something needs to be added that the distinguished Senator from Utah omitted when he referred to the results of the poll.

The ROA requested some 800 general and flag officer members to join in opposition to the canal treaties by signing the statement to which I have just referred.

Of this group only 347 officers responded to the request. A total of 340 officers signed the statement, 7 indicated their support of the treaties—they must have had to write separate letters to accomplish that—and 453 failed to respond. Incidentally, the total ROA membership is about 107,000. What a poll.

The most significant part of it, once all the facts concerning it are placed in the Record, is the number of generals and admirals who would not sign such a statement.

That, I think, puts this poll into a fairer and more objective frame of reference.

Mr. GARN. I just want to briefly respond. I do not think we can assume that as to people who did not respond what their position was one way or another. I would not like that impression left.

I get mail at home all the time that asks my opinion, and I throw most of it in the waste basket.

I may agree or disagree with that poll. But the Senator did not bother to respond to Admiral Holloway's testimony of what he thought active duty general and flag officers would do. Furthermore, to say there are 107,000, they were seeking the opinions of general and flag officers and not all the lower ranking officers. Do not believe that impression.

Mr. CHURCH. Indeed, they were. I left no impression but a factual statement of the case. It seems to me rather extraordinary for the Senator from Utah first to present this poll with an overwhelming vote against the treaty, which was nothing but a solicitation for opposition to the treaty, to which half or more of the generals and admirals refused to respond. And then say, oh, they just threw it in the waste paper basket. I suggest to the Senator that admirals and generals who are retired would have a sufficient interest in this case that they would not simply just discard it out of hand. They knew it for what it was. It was a solicitation for opposition, and those who refrained from singing did so because they did not want to be counted a part of this opposition.

Mr. GARN. I would simply say that that is a fairly high percentage of the poll, from the polls I have been used to.

If we are talking about slanting polls, that is being done with the Byrd-Baker amendment. The answers are being turned around, in public opinion polls, because of the way the questions are being slanted there.

Mr. CHURCH. If the Senator is concerned about the slanting of polls, he has given us a straight illustration on the Senate floor about how to do it.

I will put the rest of the facts in the Record, and yield the floor.

Mr. GARN. I agree the question is slanted to get the kind of answer desired, but I will also say it does not take very many people. The overwhelming proportion of active duty military people, and retired, are opposed to this. I ask the American people to ask officers that they know, and enlisted men, and see what kind of responses they would get from the American military.

Mr. MCGOVERN. Mr. President, just one final word. I really had not intended to get into the discussion here today, primarily, of military opinion, on a matter that is essentially diplomatic and political. I would just hasten to add again that the overwhelming percentage of the testimony of our military officers who now have the obligation to defend this country is in support of the treaties.

I somehow missed one interesting observation that Admiral Holloway, the Chief of Naval Operations, made in testimony before the Armed Services Committee, but it is a rather interesting statement, and I would like to read it into the Record. It was a brief exchange involving Senator Stennis and Admiral Holloway, on January 24, just a month ago today.

The admiral said:

If I can give my view which I think is representative of the Chiefs, we had two choices: one essentially was no new treaties, which could cause us to withdraw from the canal in the next 5 years under adverse conditions.

That is a very serious thought, that the Chief of Naval Operations and the Joint Chiefs are seriously considering that as the kind of option they might face then, if we had to labor under the 1903 treaty, that within 5 years time they might be forced to withdraw under adverse conditions.

"or"—

Said Admiral Holloway—

we could, with new treaties, provide for the future security of the canal. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one point; I think that there was no member of the JCS with a stronger conviction than myself of the national need for the use of the canal for our defense purposes in the future, and I was seeking the best solution to give us the highest assurance that we would be able to use the canal in the future.

It was on that basis, he went on to say, that he came down squarely on behalf of these new treaties.

Now, Mr. President, to get back to what I started to say here about an hour ago, our distinguished new colleague, Senator Muriel Humphrey, delivered her maiden speech in the Senate of the United States today, on the very theme that I had intended to discuss this afternoon.

What she, in effect, is calling on the Senate to do is to consider costs that are even greater than any we have talked about here today: that is, the potential cost to the standing of the United States in Latin America and throughout the third world, indeed throughout the world, indeed throughout the world, if we were to reject these treaties that had been negotiated in good faith.

Just to quote a couple of passages from this eloquent address on the Senate floor earlier today by Senator Humphrey:

The Panama Canal Treaties symbolize the pivotal point in U.S. policy towards Latin America and the nations of the developing world.

Then she went on to warn:

But let us be mindful of the fact that our greatness depends as much on our tradition of dedication to justice and fairness, the Founding Fathers' ideals and dreams of liberty, and our healthy political and economic base at home, as upon military power.

She went on to say:

We are a world power. But do we have to prove it by flexing our muscles against little Panama? I think this would be the most preposterous position in which we could place ourselves.

Mr. President, I think that is an eloquent statement from the new Senator Humphrey, and one that her late beloved husband, Hubert Humphrey, would be very proud to see her underscore in her maiden address to the Senate.

I must say that same thought has come to my mind as I have read some of the mail that has come in to my office from all over the country saying, "Why can't we stand up to Panama?" As though somehow our manhood, our patriotism as a nation, was under attack in these treaties.

I do not think anybody is so foolish as to think the United States is going to impress either ourselves or anybody else simply by showing that we have the power to stand up to Panama. Of course, we do. We demonstrated that in 1903, when we negotiated this treaty that has caused so much trouble over the last 75 years. It is not a question of whether the United States is as strong as Panama, or strong enough to rebuff them diplomatically or militarily or any other way we see fit. Obviously we have the power to quash Panama any afternoon. The question is what is just, what is fair, what will best enhance the standing of the United States in the world?

I just want to commend, in the strongest possible terms, Mrs. Humphrey's reminder to us here earlier today that the power and greatness of this country are not measured by how we flex our muscles toward a little country like Panama, but whether or not we are true to the ideals of self-determination, dignity, and justice that have brought this country to a position of power, influence, and greatness in the world.

I have listened with some care to the heated public debate that has gone on since these treaties were signed last summer, and I must say that after all that time I am still left wondering what the opponents of the treaty expect to happen should they prevail. What are the results they are so anxious to achieve?

A number of results have been implied. We are told, for example, that if we junk these agreements, we will then be free to negotiate with some other country in Central America for a new sea level canal, and we will not need Panama any more. But, Mr. President, in that connection, the most careful studies have been made of alternative canal routes in Central America, and these studies have without exception come down very decisively on the conclusion that the only feasible route for a canal in Central America is in Panama.

Back in January of this year, when we had the former executive director of the sea level canal study before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the man who had participated in some 5 years of study of alternative routes, speaking for that whole committee, he said:

I assure you that there are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama.

Mr. President, we spent $22 million for that study, and it contains some of the most distinguished Americans on the study: Milton S. Eisenhower, Robert Storey, Kenneth Field, Raymond A. Hill, and the chairman, Robert B. Anderson. After some 5 years of study, they came to this conclusion:

Limiting the choice to Panama costs the United States nothing, and in return, we get the commitment that other powers cannot meddle in this matter. The theoretically feasible routes across Nicaragua and Costa Rica are 140 miles and 100 miles in length, in comparison with the Panamanian route.

It goes on to point out that what they proved after the expenditure of $22 million and 5 years of study, "is that we could not build a canal outside Panama."

I think the argument which has been made here that because, during the next 22 years, we sign an agreement not to build a sea level canal elsewhere in Central America other than Panama, means we have given away nothing. We have given away something we would not consider anyway. That is the possibility of a canal in Nicaragua or someplace else our experts' studies have ruled out as not being feasible.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McGOVERN. Yes, I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. I think the Senator is unquestionably right. He has said that we yielded nothing. We did not want to preserve the option to build a canal outside of Panama when our studies have already shown us that only a canal within Panama would be economically feasible. So we gave up nothing.

The other side of the coin is that we got something from the Panamanians that was rather valuable.

This is why our negotiators sought to insert this provision in the treaty. It is not the Panamanians who urged it upon us, but it was the American negotiators who sought to insert the provision.

What we got back was a commitment on the part of Panama not to permit any other country during the life of the agreement to build a sea level canal in Panama, a matter of the greatest consequence to the United States and our future security interests.

So we have a provision which weights heavily in favor of the United States, securing a commitment from Panama of enormous value to us in return for a commitment on our part of little value at all. It may be the most one-sided provision in our favor in the treaty before us.

Mr. MCGOVERN. I believe the point is well taken.

In addition to this argument that I regard as a specious argument about forfeiting the right to build a canal outside of Panama, a right that we are not about to exercise with or without this treaty, there has also been another argument expressed about the concern for human rights, the implication being that the present government in Panama is of an authoritarian character.

It is interesting to me that some of the same people who would argue that it is perfectly proper for us to maintain forces in South Korea to back the regime of General Park, which, if anything, is an authoritarian regime, are so concerned about the authoritarianism of Panama. I wish that government was somewhat more democratic than it is, too, but I do not see how we could carry on diplomatic relations with the rest of the world if we are going to limit those relations only to those countries which have a parliamentary democracy. That is going to eliminate a lot of allies and alleged friends of ours around the globe.

It has also been said that we could better defend the canal under the old treaty, that we could have more assurance that the canal would remain secure and operational if it is in American hands.

There was also some point that was to be drawn from the secret session. As I suggested before, I found it very hard to discover the relevance between the treaties and the disclosures we heard earlier this week. I suppose the implication was that if we turned the treaties down it is going to somehow help solve the drug problem in Latin America. Upon closer examination these claims all tend to crumble.

Even setting aside the feasibility problem and the billions in cost, there is, for example, no reason at all to believe that we can negotiate a better deal with Nicaragua than with Panama. Nor is there reason to believe that the human rights of the Panamanians will improve in the slightest should these treaties be scrapped. It is likely the opposite will happen, that all Panamanians will suffer both the injury of oppression and the continued insult of a foreign zone dividing their nation.

Similarly, the matter of defending the canal should have been long since settled, both by the explicit testimony of our top military commanders and by simple logic.

Most deeply of all we can set aside the notion that there is somehow a relation between these treaties and the international traffic in narcotics. Whether we support or oppose the treaties, I think most of us have come to the view that the secret session proved to be irrelevant and a waste of our time. It is quite safe to predict that rejecting the treaties will have no impact at all on the problem of narcotics.

So what we will really have if we reject these treaties, after weighing all the claims, is it seems to me we come down to only one indisputable result. It will be the right, if we reject these treaties, to throw out our chests and say that the Panama Canal is still ours. In the final analysis, that is what we are really talking about, the prize of claimed ownership. It is a sort of collective possessiveness over a thing to which we have, over the years, become strongly attached.

I must say, Mr. President, that the strength of that emotion is surprising. People who never thought about the canal are discovering now they cannot live without it.

I do not suggest that that feeling can or should be ignored. I do not want to ridicule it or minimize it. We simply cannot set aside the strong feelings that many of our fellow citizens have. I have tried to answer every letter which has come to my office on this subject.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGOVERN. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator mentioned if the Senate in its wisdom should reject the treaties. Would not the Governments of the United States and Panama have the additional option of having their negotiators return to the negotiating table and negotiate further treaties which could then be submitted to the U.S. Senate for its advice and consent?

Mr. McGOVERN. That is right. It means we might get another treaty back here about the year 2000.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; but the Senator must realize that the 13 years of negotiating finally resulted in a treaty which was signed. Then if the U.S. Senate, by the amendment process, has an opportunity to show what it would agree to, and finally would reject these treaties, would that not serve as a blueprint for the possible work by the negotiators in arriving at an earlier agreement on the treaties?

Mr. McGOVERN. I will say to the Senator that is what this debate is all about. If these treaties are not in the interest of the United States they ought to be rejected.

The argument I would make here today, which I have made before, is that the treaties are clearly in our interest; that they have been in the process of negotiation now ever since 1965; that our negotiators have done a good job; that we have been able to suggest certain changes. Recommendations which came out of the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 14 to 1 I am confident will be overwhelmingly adopted here on the floor of the Senate which will strengthen the treaties.

I think the time has come now not to negotiate another treaty, but to face up to these very carefully drafted documents before us. That is what we are in the process of doing.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; but the Senator is supposing a situation where the treaties are defeated. But would not the debate here, in the U.S. Senate, point out the shortcomings that would serve as guidelines for the negotiators to come up with a treaty to which the Senate would give its advice and, finally, its consent?

Mr. McGOVERN. I can only say to the Senator that it is my own judgment, having sat through all of the discussions on this matter and the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, that I do not anticipate at all that we could negotiate in the next 25 years a substantially better treaty than the one we now have.

What I fear is that if we reject this treaty, we would set off the kind of reaction in Panama that would lead to a hardening of lines, that we might get a more extremist type of government replacing the one that is already in power. I think we are walking a very fine line politically with Panama right now.

General Torrijos, for all of his faults, has made a number of concessions to the sensibilities of the U.S. Senate. He spent hours and hours hosting Senators who went down there with questions. He tried, I think, the best that any political leader could to modify the treaties from time to time and accept language that was important, to consider the sensibilities of Americans, and particularly the Senate.

Maybe the time has come for us to consider some of the sensibilities in Panama. They have political problems as well. This canal may be an important issue to us, but it is the issue in Panama. I think one would be hard pressed to put this on a list of the top three or four problems before America today, but it is No. 1 in Panama. It is the issue.

I think they have been remarkably flexible in the way they have approached these negotiations over the years, but I would shudder at the thought of going through that whole process again. I am not sure what we would come up with.

I might say to the Senator, there was a draft treaty back in 1967 that the Panamanians tentatively agreed to that permitted us to stay there until the year 2004. Now we have come back, 10 years later, with a treaty where they are asking us to get out 4 years earlier. Maybe if we go back still a third time, they may say, "Get out today; that is all we will settle for."

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and there was a draft of the treaties, I believe, in July of last year that was changed drastically in the last few days before the expiration of the 6-month period of service of Ambassador Linowitz.

I might say further that if the defeat of the treaties would result in the toppling of the Torrijos regime down there and the return of a democratic form of government to Panama. I would think that would be one further reason why we should defeat these treaties.

Mr. MCGOVERN. For whatever it is worth, I would like to give the Senator not only my judgment, but the judgment of some of our top diplomats who have been in that part of the world that, if General Torrijos is toppled because of the rejection of this treaty, it will not be to bring in a greater measure of democracy. It will be because the left wing and some of the Communist-tinged groups down there who are saying that this treaty is too generous to the United States will be the ones who will take over. Then we will be faced with a much tougher and more rigid situation than we are today.

I might also add that at least one of the witnesses—I think it was the Secretary of State—who testified before the Committee on Foreign Relations said that the more democratic government there is in Panama, the more they are going to insist on Panamanian national interests being represented in this treaty. So we may face a much tougher situation if this treaty is rejected than we do today.

Mr. ALLEN. In other words, the Senator takes the position that it is to our interest, then, to perpetuate in office the Torrijos dictatorial regime; is that correct?

Mr. MCGOVERN. I think it is in our interest to negotiate a treaty that we have hammered out with the Panamanian Government under which, I think, major concessions have been made to the United States. I think it is in the interest of this country, and it is really not up to us to try to dictate the kind of government they have in Panama. Obviously, it is not the kind of ideal democracy we would like, but the Senator from Alabama and I could think of a good many other countries around the world that we negotiate with, that we sell arms to, where we even have American forces stationed, that also leave something to be desired in the way of democratic institutions.

Mr. ALLEN. I am sure that is true. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. MCGOVERN. What I do suggest here today, Mr. President, is that all the considerations be weighed, because I think the job of the Senate is not simply to reflect transitory popular emotions, but, as the majority leader reminded us a few days ago, to apply some measure of judgment to consider what is in the long-term interests of the country, even if it means losing some popularity now.

On one side of the balance, we have this matter of national pride in the history of the canal and the claim of present ownership, what is referred to as rights in the zone as if we were sovereign. If we reject the treaties, it will be essentially for the sake of those values. Now the question is, What are some of the potential costs of rejecting the treaty?

First, it is not hard to forecast the impact on our relations with Panama. Two-thirds of that country's voters supported the treaties in the plebiscite and there is scant reason to expect that either they or the other third would feel more kindly toward the United States if the treaties were killed.

I think the evidence is very strong that the one-third of the Panamanians who voted against the treaties in the present form did so because they wanted treaties that were slanted more in the direction of Panamanian interests. Some of them did not like the idea that we were going to stay there until the year 2000. That became one of the rallying cries against the treaties. Nevertheless, they were adopted by a 2-to-1 margin in the Panamanian plebiscite.

We have only to recall the situation in the aftermath of the tragic rioting in 1964 to envision the shattering effect that failure to ratify the treaties can have on United States-Panamanian relations. At that time, diplomatic relations were broken between the two countries. An atmosphere of hostility surrounded the American community in Panama and there was uncertainty concerning the operation of the canal, whether it could, in fact, remain in operation. Should the treaties now be voted down, I think Panamanian leaders would be hard put to restrain radical elements and other groups, who could point to rejection of the treaties as vindication of their position that violence was the only way to achieve Panama's objectives.

I suspect that is what Admiral Holloway, the Chief of Naval Operations, meant when he told the Armed Services Committee that they were considering an option in the event of the rejection of these treaties, that they might have to withdraw under adverse conditions within a 5-year timespan. Indeed, Panamanian leaders would have little incentive or reason for restraint. Escalation of demands against the United States would be the order of the day. Since rejection of the treaties would presumably result from demands for tougher terms, these demands from the U.S. side would exacerbate further our relationship with Panama.

In these circumstances, we would have lost, possibly permanently, the opportunity to negotiate a treaty on terms as reasonable as those the Senate is now being asked to approve.

Even if some future Panamanian Government had the strength and the popular support to reopen negotiations, it would almost certainly insist on terms less favorable to us than the present treaty.

Along with these political impacts, a failure of the treaties would deal a severe setback to the Panamanian economy and to our economic relations with Panama.

Mr. President, one of the things that I learned on a trip to Panama in December, a trip I was not sure would produce any new insights, but I went primarily because I thought as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee I ought to at least familiarize myself with attitudes there, and one of the first things I learned on that trip was that investment is paralyzed at the present time. That is, both Panamanian and foreign investment coming in from outside is virtually paralyzed while the investors wait to see what the outcome of the treaty debate here in the Senate is going to be.

I talked with a group of American business men one morning over breakfast who said that the reason for that is that a great many people in the business community and in the investment community fear a condition of instability and agitation if these treaties were to be rejected businessmen one morning over breakfast that would make business investment very uncertain, indeed.

So that with each passing month, the opportunity for economic growth and economic investment in Panama is being hampered by the delay of these treaties.

I do not cite that to stampede Senators into a quick ratification of these treaties. I know better than to think that would work, in any event. But simply to indicate it is another factor we ought to keep in mind, that Panama is a little country with economic problems of its own. It does need whatever investment it can secure to provide jobs and opportunities for its people, and the indefinite delay of action on these treaties is paralyzing that investment process.

On the basis of a booming economy in the 1960's, the present Panamanian Government has undertaken development programs designed to spread this wealth to its rural population. But the uncertainty about the canal treaties on top of a worldwide economic recession has caused Panama's economy to falter. Rejection of the treaties and the further uncertainty that would follow would certainly dampen hopes for renewed economic development.

I think radical groups could then point to the failure of free enterprise in Panama and would be encouraged to offer authoritarian or Communist models in its place.

I think it would be ironic, indeed, if rejection of the treaties helped bring to power the very groups that treaty opponents say they most fear and wish to frustrate.

Perhaps the greatest loss in this relationship would be the disillusionment of tens of thousands of Panamanians who count themselves friends of the United States and share our beliefs in what it stands for.

It is interesting, Mr. President, that the top officials in the Torrijos government and their negotiators very discreetly avoided any threats of what they were going to do if we do not ratify these treaties. They warn us about what some of the more radical and extreme elements in the country might do, but, to the best of my knowledge, there is no Panamanian official in office today, no one of their negotiators, who has said, "Either you ratify these treaties or there is going to be military trouble, there is going to be a tax on the canal, there is going to be sabotage from us."

They imply that may happen from some of the people they cannot control, but it has not been a policy that their government has pursued in a heavy-handed way as a threat over our negotiators or over the U.S. Senate.

Despite the publicity about anti-American feeling in Panama, that country probably has closer ties to the United States than any other in Central America because of the presence of the canal and the many ties that have developed between us. Thousands of Panamanian citizens have attended our colleges and technical schools. They have come to know us and our way of life and to develop a respect for our freedom and fairness. This has led them to accept the present treaties, even though they will not achieve many of their cherished national aspirations for nearly a generation.

So if we dash these hopes, this country will have lost its most valuable asset in Panama, and that is the confidence of its people in what we stand for as a nation.

Panama, of course, is only one country. Strong feelings on that same issue spread throughout Latin America and in much of the Third World.

Traveling through other countries in Central America and Latin America in December, in Peru, in Venezuela, in Costa Rica, in Puerto Rico, and elsewhere, every political figure I talked with in those countries said that the rejection of these treaties would be an enormous setback for the influence and prestige of the United States throughout Latin America.

While we do not consider our presence in Panama as colonial, Latin Americans frankly do regard our arrangements in the Canal Zone under the 1903 Treaty as a colonial vestige of the past, and at sharp odds with all we say about national independence and freedom from colonial domination.

In December I visited three friendly countries in Latin America—Costa Rica, Venezuela, and Peru—to seek candid expressions on the treaties. In each case I heard that rejection would severely damage our standing in Latin America. By the same token I heard that the signing of the treaties brought this country enhanced respect and support. They are viewed not as a retreat, but as a reaffirmation of American greatness. This is an issue on which Panama has the full support of all the member states of the Organization of American States.

We find ourselves similarly isolated, not only in Latin America, but the United Nations, on this contention that we should be allowed to continue under the 1903 treaty.

If the treaties are now rejected, it is highly likely that we would, once again, come under criticism and attack in the United Nations and other international bodies. And we could hardly look even to our closest allies in Western Europe for support. Since the end of World War II, we have been pressing the British, the French, the Dutch, the Spanish, and the Portuguese to give up their colonial position around the world and we can hardly expect their sympathy for any effort on our part to hang on to a colonial vestige of our own.

Meanwhile, by our own action, we would hand the Communists a ready made issue with which to embarrass and divide us from those who would be our friends. There is understandable exasperation in this country at the political double standard that is sometimes displayed in the United Nations. But if we are to succeed in our efforts to eliminate these abuses, surely we cannot practice what is regarded by so many as a double standard of our own.

But let me put this in a more positive way. I submit that our own history—our own origins, traditions, and principles of independence—are among our greatest assets in international affairs. I think one of the great tragedies of our recent history has been our tendency to underestimate the power of these traditional American values, while we have overestimated what might be accomplished by force of arms.

Why, then, should it seem strange to us that smaller countries are more and more resentful of outside interference, and that they are demanding a greater say over their own destinies? Those are precisely the aspirations that founded our own country. Two centuries ago the British had a claim to sovereignty over America which was, by the lights of that time, every bit as valid as our claim to the Canal Zone is today. And now it would be especially valuable to our international standing if, less than 2 years after our Bicentennial Celebration, we could remember our own history as well as others do. There are systems in the world who believe, to their shame, that they have a right to control other nations. We should be proud to say that America is not such a country, and to say that democracy is not such a system. That is exactly what these treaties say. And that is why I not only accept them but enthusiastically embrace them. It is why I have so much trouble understanding those who would give up this precious international asset these treaties represent simply to be able to proclaim, "the Canal is still ours."

The political cost of refusing these treaties ought to be reason enough to endorse them, indeed, to welcome them. But there is another cost which troubles me still more.

Over the past several months there has been a great deal of discussion over the question whether the United States has retained a right to intervene militarily in Panama should we conclude that the canal is endangered or that our access to it might be limited or denied. I must confess that all of this talk gave me an eerie feeling. Here we were, just a few years after young Americans had stopped being killed and maimed as a consequence of our intervention in Vietnam, nonetheless demanding a guaranteed right to intervene somewhere else.

Of course, it is not my contention that those who wanted the treaties clarified on this score were spoiling for another jungle war. I support the amendments recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee, to incorporate the Carter-Torrijos understanding into the treaty language itself.

It is my contention, however, that another consequence of treaty rejection will be a heightened risk that our "right" to fight over the canal will have to be exercised. And that prospect, too, must be weighed on the scales.

Too much of the debate has operated on the apparent assumption that a war over the Panama Canal will be a nice, sterile sort of exercise in which we will show the flag and the adversary will fade away. The terms used are "right to intervene" and "right to defend." No one ever talks about the "right to send young Americans to be killed" in another guerrilla war.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have told us that the defense of the canal will be much easier if the United States and Panama are in a partnership rather than in a relationship of antagonism. One reason why that is true is that a military or terrorist threat to the canal is far less likely with the treaties than without them. Moreover, without the treaties, the kind of conflict which might happen would be more deadly—not isolated terrorism, but an insurgency from among the indigenous population, with the continuous threat of death from an adversary that cannot even be seen.

Again, I make no charge that anyone here would welcome such a conflict. But we are dealing with conditions bearing directly on the risk. And as we do that, we should always bear in mind that for all of our talking, not one of us here has to fear that we will be required to go down and take part in the fighting.

These, then, are some of the consequences we should expect if the treaties are defeated. Secretary of State Vance summarized similar results in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee last September:

Our relations with Panama would be shattered, our standing in Latin America damaged immeasurably, and the security of the canal itself placed in jeopardy.

To that I would add what would be for some Americans the gravest result of all—a measurable increase in the danger of a war resulting in death or injury.

And for what?

There might be some international causes that would warrant all of these costs. No one should ever doubt our willingness to sacrifice when our own security is at stake or when our friends are under attack.

But let us also show the world and ourselves that we have a sense of proportion. Let us declare that we will not squander our values or our credentials for the sake of misplaced national pride. Let us ratify these treaties, as our best assurance both that we will have continuous access to the Panama Canal and that lives that might someday be needlessly spent will be spared.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to insert in the Record an excellent editorial from one of the major newspapers in my State, the Sioux Falls Argus Leader.

The Argus Leader makes the unassailable point that we need not repudiate the past in order to recognize the need for new arrangements with Panama. The editors endorse the treaties now pending in the Senate with this concluding thought:

The world has changed greatly since the 1903 treaty between Panama and the United States. To insist on staying with the status quo in Panama is to disregard history and the emerging nationalism of the world's smaller nations.

A change of course in 1978, by ratification of the treaties, is a positive step that the world's free superpower can take without fear of its security or vital interests. Both will be served by ratification of the treaties by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I heartily agree with that editorial. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial of Sunday February 19, together with an editorial published in the Washington Post of February 1, entitled "Remember Panama?" be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the editorials were printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.), Argus-Leader, Feb. 19, 1978]

SENATE SHOULD RATIFY TREATIES

"Truly there is a tide in the affairs of men, but there is no gulf stream setting forever in one direction."—James Russell Lowell, Literary Essays (1870–1890), New England Two Centuries ago.

This quotation from the 19th century is pertinent to the great national debate over the Panama Canal Treaties. They represent a different direction for the United States in its relationship to the canal and with Panama in the future. It is a direction we think this country should take.

The debate has polarized many elements of the citizenry, and particularly the conservative wing, with dire predictions of what will happen if the United States Senate gives its advice and consent for ratification. The predictions see the United States retreating and giving up a vital part of its defense.

Liberals have been ready with equally grim propaganda, chastizing the United States for using gunboat diplomacy in aiding Panama in its break from Colombia and stuffing a favorable treaty down the throats of the newly free Panamanians in 1903. Liberals should mute their call for an end to colonialism. The United States record refutes this contention. Similarly, critics of the treaties should stop wailing about Uncle Sam caving in under pressure. This country didn't.

We see a different scenario. Our construction of the canal and U.S. presence in Panama have helped that country greatly, both in an economic way and in the general well-being of Panamanians. We need make no apologies for the past in taking a different course for the future. It is time, however, to recognize the Panamanians' nationalism, and their desire for a place in the sun.

No country, large or small, wants its territory bisected by a zone controlled by another nation. The Egyptians in the 1950s demonstrated this in nationalizing the Suez Canal. Panama has an American enclave—10 miles wide—bisecting its middle. Panamanians want to control their own, operate the canal and get a piece of the action. They are demonstrating the same yearnings American colonists had in another era.

The treaties which President Jimmy Carter has sent to the U.S. Senate for its advice and consent represent the work of four presidents. The initiative for a new treaty started with President Lyndon B. Johnson, following the strains arising from deepseated Panamanian dissatisfaction which culminated in riots along the Canal Zone border in January 1964. The riots killed 20 Panamanians and four Americans and injured 500 persons.

In December 1964, Johnson, after consulting with former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower and with bipartisan support, made a commitment to negotiate a wholly new, fixed term canal treaty.

Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford continued that commitment. Carter concluded the negotiations with Panama and signed the treaty in Washington last September.

The first of the two new treaties—the Panama Canal Treaty—terminates previous treaties and spells out ways in which the canal is to be operated and defended until 2000. The United States retains primary responsibility for canal operations and defense until the end of the century, but with increasing Panamanian participation. The Canal Zone ceases to exist and Panama assumes general jurisdiction over the area.

The United States retains bases until 2000. The canal will be operated by a U.S. government agency called the Panama Canal Commission, with five American and four Panamanian directors. The United States will set tolls until the end of the century. Increased economic benefits to Panama under the treaty will come from a share of canal tolls, not from the U.S. taxpayer.

The second treaty is entitled "Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal." The canal is to remain open to merchant and naval vessels of all nations indefinitely, without discrimination as to conditions or tolls. The treaty does not give the United States the right to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. It gives the United States and Panama responsibility to insure that the canal remains open at all times. This country retains the right to defend the canal against external attack and to use the canal for its warships.

A clarifying memo issued by President Carter and Gen. Torrijos, after the treaties were signed, specified that the United States would have a right of priority passage in wartime and could take whatever action it saw fit to protect the waterway, including use of military force. In our opinion, there's no question about the right of this country to defend the canal.

We think the future defense of the canal will be in sea and air lanes on its approaches. This country's military, in time of war, would destroy any enemy vessel outside either end of the canal if it ever gained neutral passage.

Giving up military bases in the present Canal Zone after 2000 is a drawback, but cooperation between this country and Panama should diminish any future ground threat against the canal. Panamanian operation should also decrease the threat of terrorism from within. It will be to Panama's national interest to keep the canal operating. This seems preferable to the possibility of jungle guerrilla operations if the Yanks stayed beyond 2000.

There has been criticism of Gen. Torrijos as a strong man and a Marxist. His strength has brought some stability to Panama; the claims that he is a Communist are so much bunk. He's a nationalist. His people have approved the treaties in a referendum.

The world has changed greatly since the 1903 treaty between Panama and the United States. To insist on staying with the status quo in Panama is to disregard history and the emerging nationalism of the world's smaller nations.

A change of course in 1978, by ratification of the treaties, is a positive step that the world's free superpower can take without fear of its security or vital interests. Both will be served by ratification of the treaties by the U.S. Senate.

REMEMBER PANAMA?

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 1, 1978]

It's all too typical of the self-indulgence with which the Panama issue has been debated that so little consideration was initially given to Panama's likely and legitimate objections to treaty changes being wrought in Washington. With State Department approval, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 14 to 1 last Friday to incorporate as a new article in the treaties the earlier Carter-Torrijos executive language spelling out American defense and transit rights after 2000. Only when Gen. Omar Torrijos raised the question with visiting senators did it dawn on Americans that adding a new article would compel Panama to go the risky route of submitting the treaties to another plebiscite.

It is interesting to see why the treaties, which won 66 per cent of the vote last October, would probably not survive a second plebiscite, or so the best judge, Gen. Torrijos, believes. Part of the explanation lies in discontents of other sorts with the general—discontents that surface quite easily in the freer atmosphere he has allowed to flourish to persuade Americans he's no dictator. Another part lies in growing nationalistic resentment against the very concessions he's accepted to make the treaties acceptable to the United States. Can Americans envisage, for instance, granting a foreign country the right of military intervention, or hosting wave after wave of Panamanian legislators come to check out whether the United States was fit for their diplomatic company?

Strongman Torrijos has even felt it necessary to say that if the treaties are approved he'll step down. By this offer he evidently means to disarm Americans who complain of having to do business with a dictator, and to win support for the treaties from Panamanians who object to his personal rule. If he were in fact a dictator, of course, he would have engineered a larger margin in the first plebiscite, and the treaties would not be facing rejection in the second, and he would not be considering stepping down. Some pro-treaty Americans privately wish he were a dictator!

On Monday the Foreign Relations Committee corrected its Friday error and agreed to work the Torrijos-Carter language into existing treaty articles, rather than write a new one. Although the practical effect would presumably be the same, Panamanian authorities apparently have concluded that this formulation would avoid the need for a second plebiscite. That's a determination—however difficult it may be for some senators to comprehend—that is up to the Panamanian government to make, according to its own reading of what is politically tolerable in Panama. As it heads into floor debate, however, the Senate must keep in mind that no further assaults on Panamanian nationalism can be condoned. The substance of the American demands has been met. It is thoughtful of the majority and minority leaders to offer their distinguished colleagues the opportunity to strut and posture and show their constituents how forceful and vigilant they can be in stiffening the treaties. But this opportunity must be exercised within narrow limits. It cannot be taken as license for the sort of further arm-twisting that would put the treaties back into jeopardy in Panama.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, earlier this afternoon, when I made the statement that the Torrijos regime had a poor record in the field of human rights, the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) asked me to document that statement. He stated that he wished to have some sort of documentation of this statement, inasmuch as he did not feel that this accusation was correct.

I did not have in my file with me at the time a documentation of that accusation, though the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) did produce a survey or an analysis by Freedom House, touching on the human rights record of many countries throughout the world.

I had stated that there had been a survey by an international organization rating various countries on a scale of 1 to 7, as to their record on human rights, and that this survey rated Panama 6 in the area of civil rights and 7 in the area of political rights.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama has covered it, but I did not follow to the point I would like to understand it. What does a 6 and a 7 mean? Is that a high score or a low score? What is it?

Mr. ALLEN. I should have stated that it is a scale of 1 to 7, with 1 being the highest and best rating and 7 being the lowest and worst rating.

Panama scored a 6 on civil rights and a 7, which is the lowest possible rate, on political rights.

The distinguished Senator from Alaska produced the document or the analysis from Freedom House, and the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt) volunteered the information that the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. Javits) was a member of the board of directors of this organization.

Mr. CURTIS. Who made this rating the distinguished Senator from Alabama is talking about? Whose rating is that?

Mr. ALLEN. I have not gotten to that. I have some documentation here I wanted to insert at this point.

Mr. CURTIS. I see.

Mr. ALLEN. I have it here with me. I am getting ready to insert it.

Mr. CURTIS. Whose rating is the Senator talking about that gave Panama a 6 on a 1-to-7 scale?

Mr. ALLEN. That was Freedom House I just referred to.

Mr. CURTIS. I see.

Mr. MCGOVERN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. MCGOVERN. Does the Senator value the judgment of Freedom House?

Mr. ALLEN. In this particular area I do, yes.

Mr. MCGOVERN. Is the Senator aware that they endorsed the Panama Canal treaties?

Mr. ALLEN. We are not talking about that. We are talking about their rating in regards to their human rights record. That is what we are talking about.

Mr. MCGOVERN. I thought if the Senator thought highly of their judgment on some issues he might also think highly on others.

Mr. ALLEN. I said this particular area. I do not agree with the distinguished Senator from South Dakota on all of his positions and I do not agree necessarily with Freedom House on their analyses.

But the distinguished Senator from Alaska was wanting some sort of documentation, and I furnished it, and if I would be allowed to I want to furnish some additional documentation.

Mr. MCGOVERN. I make one more intervention here and just observe to the Senator that if his point is that we should be careful about entering into treaties with countries that do not have a high record on human rights I remind him that we already have a treaty with Panama and have had since 1903 so it seems to me that if the point is—

Mr. ALLEN. We did not know at that time that a dictatorial regime was going to come in about 60 years later.

Mr. MCGOVERN. That is a chance I think the Senator would agree that one has to take in dealing with Latin America, that sometimes over a 60-year period the chances are fairly good you are going to have something other than a constitutional democracy.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that. I am making these remarks in connection with the national policy of the administration to seek to achieve human rights throughout the world, and if we do have a government that is guilty of not observing human rights, I think that is very pertinent on the issue involved.

But the reason the Senator from Alabama is furnishing this information at this time is that he was requested to do so by the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. MCGOVERN. Just one more observation. I remind the Senator that to whatever extent we have a government in Panama today that is somewhat below where the Senator would like on the human rights scale, I will remind him that is despite the fact that we had Americans living down there in the Panama Canal Zone under the existing treaty which I think the Senator from Alabama prefers to the new treaty. So apparently even with this long American presence there, we have not been able to lift the human rights standards to where the Senator would like them.

Maybe with a new treaty where Panama is given more control over its own destiny instead of having a foreign presence 10 miles wide right across the center of their country it might be that you would have a more unified government, one with a greater sense of national pride and perhaps they would even pay greater attention to such things as human rights.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator may draw this conclusion, but I do not feel that just because Panama is going to receive approximately $100 million a year out of this Panama Canal Treaty during the next 22 years that would necessarily result in a better record on human rights. Nor do I put any credence whatsoever in Mr. Torrijos' assurances to a number of Senators who went to Panama to interview Mr. Torrijos, he was going to do better in the area of human rights. I do not put a bit of credence in that and with an additional $100 million a year in his pocket I think he would be much more independent, and what we are doing here is to help perpetuate in office this dictatorial regime there in Panama; whereas, if we were able to defeat the treaties the Senator suggested it might result in an overthrow of the government down there which I think would be a step in the right direction.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if I could be allowed to print these two documents I would appreciate it and then I will yield for a question.

Mr. GARN. All right.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a booklet prepared by the Council for International Security, the chairman of which is Mr. Ronald F. Docksai, Georgetown University, Graduate School of Government, here in the Nation's Capital.

This booklet, some dozen pages or so, is entitled "Violation of Human Rights and Civil Liberties in Panama." I am not going to discuss every item here but appendix B has a partial list of persons reported exiled by the Torrijos government and there are three pages of political exiles by the Torrijos regime. I did not know we had political exiles anywhere in the world since the days of the Roman Empire but apparently there are three pages of people who have been exiled from Panama by dictator Torrijos.

There being no objection, the booklet was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

VIOLATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES IN PANAMA

(By Dr. Gustave Anguizola)

INTRODUCTION

General Omar Torrijos seized power in Panama on October 11, 1968, through action of the Panamanian National Guard. The successful military coup ousted the populist Dr. Arnulfo Arias who had been in office only eleven days.¹

Since that time, charges of corruption and repression have been leveled against the Torrijos government. Torrijos has presented himself as a nationalist revolutionary leader. It has been suggested that his personal style, similar to the of Fidel Castro, has been developed by Torrijos to help him legitimize and stabilize his own position.

The record of repression, human rights violations, and corruption since October, 1968 is not consistent. These activities seem to vary according to the government's perception of its own stability and short-term objectives.

Though the Torrijos government has received military equipment² and training from the United States, it would be a mistake to seriously contemplate conclusion of major political agreements with this regime. In particular, to conclude a settlement changing the status of the Panama Canal would sanction the Torrijos government in its present form. It would also endanger the safety of the citizens of the Canal Zone.

President Carter has stirred world opinion through his focus on the issue of human rights.³ If the United States is to hold to its own historic principles of human dignity and freedom, this moral position must remain at the base of his diplomacy. To conclude in haste a major agreement with the present government of Panama would call into question the credibility of the Administration's advocacy of human rights. A Canal treaty with Torrijos could undermine U.S. foreign policy as well as do a grave injustice to the people of Panama.

The following charges raise serious questions as to the advisability of concluding major agreements with the Torrijos government. They also raise important questions about the character of the Torrijos regime.

MISUSE OF POLITICAL POWER

Omar Torrijos has exercised power in a highly personal way. In fact his government has been called a "personality cult." His powers are so broad and ill-defined as to permit regular misuse of executive authority. Only in Haiti, in fact, does a national constitution grant such absolute powers to one man by name.⁴

Article 277 of the Panamanian constitution, promulgated in 1972, refers to General Omar Torrijos, Commander-in-Chief of the National Guard, as the "recognized Maximum Leader of the Panamanian Revolution." In order to insure the fulfillment of this revolution, he is formally granted the power to:

1. Appoint commanders and officers of the armed forces and military hierarchy.
2. Appoint, with Cabinet approval, all Supreme Court magistrates, Attorney General, Attorney of the Administration, and their alternates.
3. Approve all government contracts, negotiate all government debts, and direct foreign relations.
4. Appoint the Comptroller General and Sub-Comptroller General, Director of the Autonomous and Semi-Autonomous institutions and Magistrates of the Electoral Tribunal which are to be named by the executive branch according to the Constitution and laws.
5. Coordinate all the work of public administration.
6. Participate with voting rights in all Cabinet meetings, meetings of the Legislative Commission, National Assembly of Representatives, Provincial Councils of Coordination, and the Communal Committees.⁵

Torrijos's enumerated powers extend beyond the executive sector, and vest both judicial and legislative functions in the hands of one man. Legislation in Panama, since 1968, has been both vague and abundant. Almost 4,000 new laws have been issued during the years 1968-1976. It has not been uncommon for new laws to be voided soon after passage. Contrary to Constitutional guarantees prohibiting such practice, retroactive law has also been enforced. Also, as will be detailed later, Torrijos only permits one political party to operate.

I—VIOLATION OF FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN RIGHTS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

VIOLATION OF THE RIGHT TO LIFE

Since the coming to power of Torrijos' regime, not only arbitrary arrest, but also torture and murder at the hands of the powerful G-2 State Security Police have become increasingly more frequent. The accusation is frequently made that arrested parties have evidenced opposition to the regime, or have associated with those considered opponents.

One of the most notable recorded cases constituting abuse involves a combination of human rights violations: the case of Roman Catholic Priest Hector Gallego.

In the summer of 1968, Father Gallego was appointed "Parroco" of the Santa Fe parish, located in Veraguas Province of Panama. His subsequent work, organizing agricultural cooperatives in his parish, was found damaging to the commercial interests of some powerful local relatives of Omar Torrijos. On June 9, 1971, G-2 agents entered Father Gallego's home while he slept and arrested him. There has been no word of him since that date, and the government has forbidden the Catholic Church to employ private investigators.⁷ The regime has also failed to carry out the full public investigation which had been promised. It was widely conjectured, however, that Father Gallego was tortured and murdered.⁸ Father Pedro Hernandez Robal stated on August 21, 1972 that "The Colombia priest, Father Hector Gallego, 30 years of age, was thrown into the sea from an airplane on June 9, 1971 by order of General Omar Torrijos, head of the Panamanian National Guard.

During September of 1976, a number of women related or married to known critics of the government were victimized by the National Guard:

Mrs. Blanca de Marchosky, wife of lawyer Eusebio Marchosky.

Mrs. Alma Robles de Samos, sister of Ivan and Winston Robles, lawyers in exile in Miami.

Mrs. Fulvia Morales.

These women were arrested and held incommunicado. Deprived of food and water, they were subjected to long periods of interrogation. G-2 agents and some Cuban interrogators who assist in G-2 training were involved in the questioning. The subsequent jailings included depriving the accused of beds, change of clothing, and contact with relatives.

During this period, a list of women who were married to reputed dissidents was published in the government-controlled newspapers. These same women, accused of "collaborating" with the women previously jailed, were also threatened with arrest. Arrest of persons by the government's special G-2 National Guard section is reportedly often carried out without either formal charges or warrant. The authorities may refuse to acknowledge the arrest, and may prohibit arrested persons from contacting friends or family members.

The list of persons murdered by the G-2 police is a lengthy one, (see Appendix A), and attempts by relatives or associates to investigate are reportedly usually squelched.¹⁰

In addition to the reported murder of Father Gallego, a more recent case of notes is that of Miss Marlene Mendizabal and her fiancé, Jorge E. Falconet. Both young people were members of student groups which opposed communists-oriented organizations at the University of Panama. These revolutionary leftist organizations openly supported General Torrijos.

Mr. Falconet, a student at the National University of Panama, simply disappeared, but Miss Mendizabal's body was found. The National Guard prevented an autopsy from being performed. Several student organizations at the Instituto Nacional, Miss Mendizabal's high school, sent letters to the Attorney General which accused the authorities of covering up the incident and of intimidating the victims' family members. Miss Mendizabal's mother, for example, was allegedly so badly beaten by government agents during her attempt to investigate her daughter's May, 1976, murder, that a considerable period of hospitalization was required. It is also said that the tombstone, purchased by some of Miss Mendizabal's relatives, was destroyed two days after it was placed over her grave.

¹⁰ Report of Panamanian Committee on Human Rights, Sept. 15, 1976.

It has been found that torture is widely employed by G-2 guards. Bodies which have been discovered and examined show evidence of various types of corporal abuse such as the body of Ruben Miro, a lawyer, who was tortured and murdered after his arrest.

Eduardo White died of injuries to stomach and chest inflicted by a rubber hose during his arrest.

Miss Dorita Moreno, a University of Panama medical student and member of a group opposing deposition of Arnulfo Arias, was sexually assaulted by members of the National Guard.

Three persons, Nat Mendes, Jr., Fernando Ayala, and Francisco Mata, were tortured for condemning the unexplained disappearance of Father Gallego.

Sammy Sitton was tortured by National Guard members for speaking out against the Torrijos government.

Enrique Moreno, after torture, was able to leave Panama to reside in Miami.

Father Luis Medrano was forced to wear a black hood while being driven to his execution. However, because one of the directors of "Radio Hogar" recognized the G-2 chief as one of the priest's abductors, Father Medrano was not murdered.

Antonio Poole, a British national born in Argentina, experienced during imprisonment beatings, clubbings, and prodding in "sensitive" body areas with a stick. He also underwent electric shocks administered by a 12-volt car battery attached to two cables. Mr. Poole has also related a mock execution during which he was driven with his eyes taped shut to a location away from his place of incarceration. Here he was put through a thorough pre-execution preparation, only to discover that the ritual was only a hoax.¹¹

Methods of torture have reportedly included the following:

1. Sexual abuse by sexual deviants placed in prisoner's cells.
2. Insertion of prisoners' hands in bone crushing machines.
3. Beating with a rubber hose which leaves no scars.
4. Blows with the fist.
5. Long periods of interrogation without recesses for sleep, under strong lights, and without clothing.
6. Bathing of prisoners in ice water.
7. Electric shocks applied to sensitive body parts.
8. Simulated execution, a psychological torture, usually accompanied by physical abuse.
9. Forcing prisoners to stand for long periods away from a wall with legs spread, hands on the neck, and forehead touching the wall. Any movement results in beating with a rubber hose.¹²

DENIAL OF FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION

When the military seized power in Panama in 1968, ten political parties were dissolved.¹³ Though parties are allowed to exist, according to the 1972 Constitution, only the People's Party (The Communist Party) is sanctioned by the Torrijos regime. This party alone, headed by Secretary General Ruben Dario Sousa, operates freely and openly. In addition to Omar Torrijos, other prominent People's Party members include: Romulo Escobar Bethencourt, Chairman of the National Information Commission; Juan Materno Vasquez, President of the Supreme Court; and Marcelino Jaen, President of the National Legislative Assembly.

Various other political organizations have reportedly been forced underground. The Social Democratic Movement, begun in February, 1976; the Movement of Independent Lawyers; the Odontologist Association; the Engineers and Architects Society; and other professional and political groups are said to be constantly faced with G-2 repression. For example:

Several of the organizations' directors have been removed from their positions by Torrijos.

According to sources, two former Chamber of Commerce Presidents, the President-elect, and one of its directors were exiled.¹⁴

The headquarters and records of the Panama Business Executive Association were confiscated in January, 1976.

¹¹ Notarized statement from Antonio Poole to Ruben D. Carles, Jr., Sept. 15, 1976, Miami. Panamanian Committee on Human Rights.

¹² Ibid.

¹⁴ Two former Presidents of the Chambers of Commerce, Guillermo Ford and Roberto Eisenmann, Sr.

For criticizing at a public meeting the government's economic policies, corruption, and repression, the presidents of the Cattlemen's Association and the Rice-growers of Panama were also exiled.

In addition to coercing enlistment of government employees into a state-controlled political organization, G-2 squads have been known to take more violent actions against labor unions. It has been disclosed that during September, 1976, the offices of the Christian Democrat-associated labor unions were broken into and ravaged. All the leaders were arrested.

Labor unions of all types are expected to join the Federacion Sindical, a communist-dominated labor federation through which organized labor could be controlled by the government. The leaders of the Federacion Sindical include long-time Communist Party members Domingo Barrio and Marta Matamoros.

The unions which have managed to maintain an independent status have faced extreme difficulties in seeking benefits from the Labor Ministry. It has been revealed that in government institutions where labor has traditionally been well represented, these groups are not allowed a voice. The pressures to which the Christian Democratic-associated groups have been subjected are said to be increasingly felt by other non-Sindical members.

When students gathered in September, 1976, for a march protesting the government's increase of milk and rice prices, and the continued lack of basic freedoms, the Torrijos government reacted swiftly. First, the state-controlled Student Federation (FZP), made up largely of non-student government agents, was sent to foment an "inter-student clash". However, what followed was a seven-day protest, resulting in disruption of Panama City's main traffic artery and damage to a large portion of the commercial sector.¹⁵

When the regime's initial attempt to place blame for the disruptions on U.S. agencies collapsed, protest became widespread. Finally, sections of the Army were deployed with tear gas, rubber hoses, anti-riot pellets, and dogs.¹⁶

At least two students died, one of whom reportedly "disappeared" from a government hospital. Three hundred to five hundred students, including some non-involved bystanders, were said to have been arrested and given the option of attending indoctrination classes at the City Jail, or of being sent to the penal colony at Coiba. It is reported that some of the imprisoned youths were tortured by electric shock. A number of those arrested were forced to stand outdoors from 13-15 hours, deprived of food, in a stationary position. After finally being given breakfast, the youths were made to attend a political awareness seminar.

This major disruptive incident compromises the regime's credibility. Especially noteworthy was the apparent absence of border crossings, anti-American demonstrations, posters, etc. which typically accompany student upheavals. Instead, the primary grievances this time were over Panama's internal problems.

VIOLETIONS OF FREEDOMS OF PRESS AND SPEECH

Both the press and radio are controlled in Panama by the Torrijos government. Media expressing opinions considered hostile to the regime are faced with the prospects of censorship or confiscation. Prominent media personnel may receive harsh sanctions.

Five radio stations, "La Voz de Colon," "Ondas Instmenas," "Radio Aeropuerto," "Radio Soberna," and "Radio Impacto" have been confiscated by the government since the 1968 coup.

Great pressure has reportedly been exerted on privately owned newspapers to bring them in line with the official press bureau, Editora Renovacion. This agency is owned by the government and managed by Rodrigo Gonzales, a close Torrijos assistant. It has been disclosed that two new private papers, "Quibo" and "La Opinion Publica" were squelched even before full-scale publication could begin, Editora La Verdad, which was to publish "La Opinion Publica," was closed down for having previously printed subversive materials. Resolution "099" of March 6, 1975, which decreed suspension of publication was, it is reported, signed by the Minister of Justice, and was authorized by Torrijos. When the Movement of Independent Lawyers published a bulletin exposing in detail the "Quibo" and "La Opinion Publica" confiscations, its directors were threatened with release of a press decree which would label their actions a crime.¹⁷

Such violations have reportedly become so flagrant that the Inter-American Press Society (SIP) at its March, 1975 meeting in San Salvador, El Salvador, published a resolution (No. 6) which exposed and condemned the Torrijos regime for acts of censorship and other violations of free speech and press:

"Considering that the regime of Panama, which has the Press under direct or indirect control, has again censored the publication of a weekly newspaper which would have been called "La Opinion Publica" (Public Opinion) even before it appeared; considering that all the measures pursued by the SIP to the government of Panama to revoke the measure as to allow the publication of "La Opinion Publica" have failed; considering that this measure is the culmination of a series of arbitrary acts against the Free Press that have been carried out by the regime of dictator Omar Torrijos, the Board of Directors has determined to condemn the arbitrary resolution that prevented the publication of "La Opinion Publica" and to renew its efforts to promote a Forum of World Opinion where the repressive methods of the regime of dictator Omar Torrijos are exposed."¹⁸

EXILE AND PERSECUTION OF NATIONALISTS

It is widely known that the right to live in one's own country without fear of arbitrary deportation or expatriation has been consistently violated by the Torrijos government. (See Appendix B).

Exiled persons have told of being accused of anti-government subversion. For example, three lawyers involved in the Movement of Independent Lawyers were exiled in January, 1969, and a fourth entered Miami after a period of physical and mental torture. Altogether, in the eight years from 1968-1976, at least 1,300 Panamanian professionals, businessmen, students, and labor union members have been exiled.¹⁹

The public record shows that Dr. Reuben D. Carles, Jr. was exiled in January, 1976, after attending a public meeting in Chiriqui Province, Panama. Open public meetings were called by community leaders in David, Chiriqui Province, to discuss grievances against the Torrijos regime. Public officials and representatives of both public and private organizations were invited to attend. Soon after attending this meeting, Dr. Carles and fourteen other businessmen and professionals (see Appendix B) were arrested and exiled.

After his arrest, Carles was transported to a National Guard headquarters where he encountered several other men who had attended the Chiriqui meeting. The prisoners were searched; and personal documents, identification cards, and family photographs were confiscated. They were then ordered to remove all clothing and watch while their billfolds were searched. Most of the group were allowed to retain only their identification cards.

Following questioning, Carles and his associates were ordered into a DC-3, and flown to Guayaquil, Ecuador. The Panamanian government explained the deportations, it is reported, as its response to an alleged conspiracy which had sought to promote class struggle. According to Dr. Carles, the Panamanian government tried to prevent the exiles from obtaining visas from other countries by pressuring officials in Ecuador to prohibit their departure. Ecuadorian authorities also informed them that two Panamanian agents had been assigned to spy on them in Guayaquil.²⁰

The first American citizen and a legal resident of Panama who was deported by the Torrijos government is David Dale Mendelson. On the afternoon of April 3, 1977, Mr. Mendelson was taken against his will by the Panamanian secret police. He was not only denied his rights as an American citizen and Panamanian resident, but was also brutally beaten. His beating resulted in a contusion of the kidney, causing blood in the urine, and requiring hospitalization. He was held incommunicado and prohibited from making telephone calls to an attorney or to the American Consulate. On April 4, 1977, he was deported, via Braniff Flight 948, to the United States. In his subsequent letter of April 29, 1977, to two Panamanian lawyers, Mr. Mendelson sought assistance in suing the Panamanian government for violation of human rights, beating, defamation of character, loss of business and personal property, and denial of contact with an attorney or the American Consulate.²¹

It has also been discovered that the Torrijos regime has sent G-2 agents to other South, Central, and North American countries to arrest and intimidate Panamanian exiles. Often posing as officials of consulates and embassies, G-2 agents are able to seek out and persecute former Panamanian citizens. Mr. Ruben Carles has also discussed the awareness and fear of Panamanian agents which he and his associates felt while in Ecuador.

²¹ David D. Mendelson reported these happenings in conversations with Phillip Harman.

Leopoldo Aragon, then in exile in Costa Rica (presently in Sweden), was actually arrested by Panamanian agents. It is also suspected that in Costa Rica, Panamanian National Guards have murdered several opponents of the Torrijos regime who sought refuge there. Agents have reportedly been extremely active in Venezuela, Colombia, Miami, New York, and Washington, D.C. A portion of a 1975 G-2 payroll sheet lists Edgardo Lopez, now the Panamanian Consul in Miami. Although Lopez is called a "guardia" (common soldier) by occupation, he receives a salary comparable to that of the highly-paid G-2 chief, Manuel Noriega.

DENIAL OF THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Officials of the Torrijos government have written laws which deny the accused the right to defense, if such person has allegedly engaged in subversive activities directed against the Panamanian state. In fact, some feel that the situation has become so serious that in November, 1969, the Panamanian National Bar Association published a statement concerning the new relationship between the individual and the law:

"With the implementation of this system, the power the Judiciary enjoys is such as to exercise both the legislative and the judicial functions. For this reason, the National Bar Association, when protesting the fact that power was given to the executive branch to sanction a crime, following the procedure of a police indictment, it does so, convinced that the defendant has no access to the guarantees of the due process of law. For this reason, the National Bar Association considers the re-establishment of the constitutional guarantees a mere formality since the decrees that have been issued consider that the practice of the citizen's inherent rights is a crime."²²

As previously noted, unwarranted entry into private homes has reportedly occurred repeatedly under the Torrijos regime. The unwarranted search of domiciles is known to be a frequent violation of privacy of individuals and their personal effects.

Both wiretapping and interference with private correspondence by the military police are reportedly routinely carried out by the military police. The Movement of Independent Lawyers was initially formed after fourteen Panamanian nationals had all their property confiscated before they were exiled to Ecuador.

II—CORRUPTION

NEPOTISM

Over forty members of Omar Torrijos' extended family hold high governmental positions. Family members so favored include three brothers and their wives, six sisters and their husbands, three nephews, and at least twelve cousins. Among Torrijos' cousins is Panama's Vice-President, Gerardo Gonzales. Other powerful positions into which Torrijos' relations have been placed are those of Director of the National Lottery and Director of the government-owned gambling casinos. Torrijos' older brother, Hugo Torrijos, Director of the gambling casinos, is also involved in "Juliano Internacional" This establishment sells and rents gambling machines. Hugo Torrijos also controls the prostitution business for Panama and Latin America and the white slave market through his company "Espectaculos Nacionales, S.A."²³

Roberto Diaz Herrera, Torrijos' first cousin, was recently promoted to lieutenant colonel in the Panamanian National Guard. Diaz Herrera's brothers are Efebo Diaz Herrera, Panamanian Ambassador to Cuba, Nitido Diaz Herrera, Chief of Customs in the Republic of Panama, and Edison Diaz Herrera, Municipal Treasurer. Marcelino Jaen is married to Omar Torrijos' sister, Toya Torrijos Herrera, and serves as president of the National Legislative Committee.

INVOLVEMENTS OF OMAR TORRIJOS OUTSIDE PANAMA

Omar Torrijos is reportedly compiling vast holdings both in Panama, Spain and Belize. His brother Moises Monchi is Panamanian Ambassador to Spain, and is said to be engaged in procuring large real estate holdings. The Torrijos government has also changed Panamanian banking laws to permit special Euro-dollar accounts.

Since Fidel Castro came to power in Cuba on January 1, 1959, only three heads of State have visited him. Omar Torrijos is one of these three leaders. He arrived in Cuba on January 10, 1976.²⁴

INVOLVEMENT IN NARCOTICS TRAFFIC

In spite of public concern about international narcotics traffic, it has been found that members of Torrijos' family and other national officials are deeply involved in Mafia-connected narcotics trade. Though not a diplomatic official, Rafael Richard, Jr. was awarded a diplomatic passport under orders of the Panamanian Minister of Foreign Affairs. Richard entered New York, under diplomatic immunity, with 70 kilos of heroin given to him by the then Panamanian Ambassador to Argentina, Moises Torrijos. When arrested, Richard was in the company of Guillermo Gonzales and Nicolas Polanco, who are closely related to Torrijos' brother, Moises.²⁵

Joaquin Him Gonzales, chief of the control two of Panama City's Tocumen International Airport, was reportedly arrested in the Canal Zone for involvement in the smuggling of drugs into Dallas, Texas. As tower chief, this Torrijos confidant was in a position to prevent searches of air cargo by the Immigration Department. Altogether, from 1971 to 1972, 641 pounds of heroin were intercepted enroute from Panama to the United States, according to the Draft Report of the Panama Canal Subcommittee of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, March 8, 1972.²⁶

III—POPULAR ORGANIZED PROTEST: PROFESSIONAL, LABOR, AND STUDENT GROUPS

Several civic groups of various types have been formed in Panama to articulate grievances and to work for reform. One of the largest is the Movimiento Civico Nacional, formed on December 11, 1973. The original Declaration of Principles was signed by 35 organizations, including the Kiwanis Club, Lions Club, Housewife's Association, and National Medical Association. The organization claimed that its members were "concerned for the restless and unsure climate in which all the classes are living in this country, and because of the absence of public and individual liberties."

The objective of the organization is the pursuit of basic freedoms which are considered lacking in Panama. Among these are: freedom of information, freedom of expression, complete independence of the judiciary, freedom to form political parties and to see political liberties recognized. Also, the group calls for permanent and complete information on Canal negotiations in order to guarantee effective sovereignty.

In a speech given before the organization by (Rotarian) Dr. Osvaldo Velasquez, the speaker suggested that the call for total Canal Zone sovereignty is used as proof of popular support for the Torrijos government. Dr. Velasquez stated that because Panamanians lack civil liberties, any new draft document on the Canal submitted to the plebiscite, as constitutionally required, undoubtedly would have been approved in advance by the Foreign Office. Because any opposition to a draft treaty would likely be met with reprisals, the plebiscite "would be nothing more than a pseudo-democratic subterfuge." Furthermore, he questioned whether the U.S. Senate would consider approval of a treaty imposed in such a fashion.²⁷

Among others in Panama who were concerned about a Torrijos-imposed agreement was Jerry Dodson, who said in his letter of resignation from his consular post (to Secretary of State William Rogers, June 5, 1969): "American citizens have been arrested on a large scale for no apparent reason. In a large number of cases, the National Guard has denied consular access to the citizens. There have been numerous cases of mistreatment as well."²⁸

CONCLUSION

General Omar Torrijos, since assuming power in 1968, has, as evidence illustrates, repeatedly violated the rights of Panamanian citizens. He has rewritten the Panamanian constitution to give himself extraordinary powers and he has supplemented these powers with arbitrary arrests, torture, and murders. While the principal targets of his oppression are political opponents, even non-political individuals like Father Gallego fall victim.

These reported violations of human rights have stirred protests in Panama. Along with evidence of profiteering by Torrijos and his family, they have led groups like the Movimiento Civico Nacional to reject Torrijos' legitimacy and his right to negotiate a new Panama Canal settlement.

In light of this, it seems that the best course for the United States is not to conclude a treaty which could augment and perpetuate Torrijos' power over Panamanians and extend it to Canal Zone residents.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent, also, inasmuch as I was asked to document by statement, to print in the Record a situation report and position paper by the U.S. Civil Council, the Canal Zone, February 1977.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

A SITUATION REPORT AND POSITION PAPER BY U.S. CIVIC COUNCILS, CANAL ZONE, FEBRUARY 1977

For the past 3½ years, the U.S. Civic Councils in the Canal Zone have been preparing position papers and formal statements of community opinion for submission to Congressmen, Canal Zone officials, Department of Army representatives, treaty negotiators and State Department officials. We have tried to maintain an attitude of rationality, calmness, and sensible perspective on the subject of a new Panama Canal treaty with the Republic of Panama. One of the points we have tried to make so often, so much so that we feel like "broken records," is that the U.S. citizen in the Canal Zone feels very apprehensive about living under the type of "legal system" now in force in the Republic of Panama.

What exists now in the Canal Zone, after 3½ years of our trying to send out warning signals and indications of problems to come, is a "siege mentality" and crisis atmosphere. Now that one of the Civic Council presidents whose signature appears at the conclusion of this paper has had experience with arbitrary detention, arrest, interrogation and search in the Republic, we are having real difficulty in maintaining an attitude of composure and calm rationality. (Attached are copies of newspaper clippings describing two recent incidents of U.S. citizens being arrested at Tocumen Airport.)

Two major concerns we have stressed to government officials during the past 3½ years has been the lack of adequate information about the treaty and the need of job assurances and transfer rights for employees who might choose not to continue their government service in the Canal Zone. All we have received in response from government officials is empty rhetoric and promises of "as soon as we know something definite we'll tell you. We must maintain confidentiality, but trust us; your employee interests will be taken care of."

Now, added to job insecurity and apprehension caused by lack of information, our people feel threatened physically because of September riots in Panama, October bombings in the Canal Zone, numerous bomb threats in the Canal Zone, and now arrests of U.S. citizens at Tocumen Airport who were not involved in breaking a law of either the Republic of Panama or the United States. It is no wonder that a "let me out of here" mentality has stimulated a constant, ever-increasing exodus of needed skilled talent out of the Canal Zone.

Our qualifications to speak out on the new Canal treaty matter include being elected representatives of the U.S. citizens living in Panama Canal communities, being year-round residents in the area whose future is being negotiated, and having a constant awareness of activities in Panama. Treaty negotiators and State Department officials have little at stake themselves personally, other than to successfully negotiate a treaty which will, in their minds, ease hemisphere tensions and get rid of chronic problems in our relations with Panama. When they finish their assignment, they will move on to other missions, leaving us to live with what they have arranged in treaty form. Generally, the treaty negotiators come to Panama for short periods of time, followed by journalists who become experts after a three-day tour that includes standard briefings by the Panamanian and Canal Zone governments. These negotiators for the most part stay in isolation on the island of Contadora and when they have consented to meet with Canal Zone labor and civic representatives, they have said relatively nothing of any significance on the treaty issue.

Let us make clear that we are American citizens deeply concerned with the present and future well-being of our nation. Our opinions on what the U.S. has at stake in the negotiation of a new Canal treaty are affected by our conversations with Panamanian friends, our reading of Spanish-language and English-language newspapers in Panama, and our understanding of the behavioral traits of the Panamanian government (something which one does not arrive at overnight or even in three days). Because of the present situation in the Republic of Panama, many of us do not "cross the border" as often, as freely, or even as nonchalantly as we used to. Fear, apprehension, and deep concern for our personal safety brought by a succession of events in Panama, have given us an increasing "locked-in" feeling in the Canal Zone. When Panamanian businessmen are deported for expressing opposition to the current government, when Panamanian citizens are arrested, tortured and even killed for having dissident opinions, and now when even our own people are subject to arrest in an airport to which we thought we had free access—the average U.S. citizen in the Canal Zone is not at all enthusiastic about submitting to the legal jurisdiction of such a repressive government. As an additional item of evidence, we have had numerous conversations with many Panamanians that you will never be able to meet. Our impression from these conversations is that when the Panamanian government officials speak today, they are NOT speaking for all the people. The people are silent because they have no effective means that they can see with which to fight back.

What effect does all this have on the operation of the Canal? Right now, it is having a disastrous effect on the quality of work being performed because workers are "uptight" constantly about physical and economic security. The pride in working on the Panama Canal that has been a part of our history, is now giving way to constant preoccupation with one's personal welfare. Many of our people are now weighing whether they want to continue working here or to escape the pressure-cooker atmosphere that is now an accepted part of our way of life in the Canal Zone.

After 3½ years of being told by our own government that they can tell us nothing yet about the treaty, imagine the shock waves that went through our workforce February 7, 1977 when we learned that Brigadier General Omar Torrijos had invited some of our labor leaders to a conference on treaty matters. In that meeting, General Torrijos told the leaders that his country could pass legislation guaranteeing the U.S. employee rights if "only you will stop all anti-treaty activity." His persuasive ability has been reduced to zero since that time as a result of the arrest of William Drummond, a local labor union official, and the detention and arrest of some other labor union officials accompanying Drummond when he attempted a second time to board a flight to Washington, D.C. on labor union business.

In defense of our Canal Zone Governor, Harold R. Parfitt, we must say that he has indicated to us many times that he has wanted to release information on the status of negotiations but that higher officials in Washington have prevented him from doing so. At this point, we will not comment on the irony that General Torrijos wanted to set up a high-level commission in his own government to keep OUR labor leaders informed.

The U.S. and foreign press have given the world the impression that any opposition to the treaty that exists here in the Canal Zone is due to overwhelming desire to preserve a status quo that resembles a "tropical paradise." We would like to correct that misconception and explain reasons for many of the ambivalent feelings that our people have toward the proposed treaty.

The average U.S. citizen working for the Panama Canal Company/Canal Zone Government is a middle-class American who wants to do his job, provide for his family and live in relative peace and tranquility. He wants to live under a system of laws that makes his rights clear and that gives him opportunity for redress of grievances. He does not believe that this atmosphere exists under the current Panamanian government. Rather, Panamanian policemen make generous interpretations of the law forbidding "disrespect to a police officer" and arrest people for offenses they didn't even know they committed. Panamanian policemen fire their pistols freely in pursuing suspects; the defendant may be dead before he's arrested.

If Panama's police force does not give its own people fair and just treatment consistently, we are not naive enough to believe that we will have "special privileges" under the "sovereignty" of Panama. Many, many of our constituents have told us that "when the Canal Zone Police go, I go." When those people leave the Canal operation, there will be real problems in recruiting qualified help from the U.S. to replace these people until the time that Panama is able to provide skilled and trained workers for all the jobs needed in the Canal operation.

During the past three to four years, our people have been receiving an "education" from the State Department concerning the treaty. By means of briefings, newspaper articles, and informal discussions, they make clear these basic premises for their argument that a new treaty is needed:

1. A Canal Zone is not necessary for the successful operation of the Canal. (They tell us that we wouldn't WANT to live in the Canal Zone if Panama didn't get the treaty it desires.)

2. The countries of Latin America give full support to Panama's claims for sovereignty over the Canal Zone and eventual control of the Canal operation.

3. The turnover of the Canal to Panama is in the best interests of the United States because not to do so would possibly involve our country in another Viet Nam-style guerrilla war.

4. Panama has a sincere interest in keeping the Canal open and would not do anything to jeopardize the efficient operation of the Canal.

5. The Canal Zone is an anachronism; it is a source of irritation. Once the U.S. citizens are scattered throughout Panama City and Colon, they will no longer be identified as "Zonians", thus easing tensions and frictions between the U.S. and Panama.

6. The economic growth of Panama depends on acquiring the lands in the Canal Zone so that Panama City and Colon can expand their business interests.

7. The denial of basic human rights within the Republic of Panama is not a matter that needs to be brought into the treaty negotiations. After all, Panama is one of the "developing countries of the world," and such behavior is quite normal for such countries.

8. The State Department would not negotiate a treaty which the U.S. Congress would not ratify.

The above concepts might be plausible to someone who has not lived here, to someone who has little or no dealings with the Panamanian government and its officials. They make the negotiation of a new treaty with Panama under the Kissinger-Tack conceptual principles as the most logical course to follow. Permit us to provide some responses to these concepts we have listed.

1. When the Canal Zone U.S.-based legal system ceases to exist, many U.S. employees will leave, creating a problem for Canal administrators in finding qualified replacements for the short-term, at least.

2. The countries of Latin America say one thing in public and another privately. In the newspapers they pledge full support for Panama's claims to the Canal. In private, to people such as former Under Secretary of State William Rogers that they are satisfied with the course that the U.S. is following in the Canal treaty negotiations. From observation of the political behavior and egocentrism of Latin American governments, one can safely say that Omar Torrijos could not depend on his Latin American neighbors for monetary or military support in an open conflict with the United States. Those other countries wish to preserve their own ties to the United States in foreign aid allotments and commercial ventures. They would not sacrifice their own interests for the sake of Torrijos' "just aspirations" concerning the Panama Canal. Rhetorical support is about all that General Torrijos can expect from Central and South America.

3. Turning over the Canal is NOT in the best interests of the United States because:

a. Construction of enough warships to provide a "two-ocean navy" would be necessary in case Panama became whimsical in permitting us access to the Canal for military vessels.

b. The Moscow-Havana axis has been casting lustful eyes for a long time toward our Canal as well as at other straits and waterways of the world. Panama does not have the military strength to withstand an assault from ANY country that would choose to invade and occupy it. The Panamanian people are not "fighters" by tradition; they have never fought a war of liberation. The average campesino reasons in this way: "Why should I get myself killed for the sake of a dictator? What will it gain me or my family? Absolutely nothing. Therefore I will simply adjust to whoever is in power. One ruler is as bad as another."

c. The flow of Alaskan oil through the Panama Canal en route to eastern ports in the United States will be in serious jeopardy when Panama has control over access to the Canal and over the setting of tolls.

d. Our first line of defense in the western hemisphere would suddenly become Harlingen or McAllen, Texas (or perhaps Key West, Florida.)

4. The Panamanian government is not noted for rational, logical behavior, nor for extensive attention toward preventive maintenance of government equipment. At this point, the government, which is nearly bankrupt, needs money desperately. This government has already indicated an interest in increasing the tolls 13-fold when they gain control of the Canal. This would seriously jeopardize the economic health of the Canal, and the government's lackadaisical attitude toward repairs and maintenance would contribute to the mechanical breakdown of the Canal (unless the United States agreed to continue supplying parts and maintenance indefinitely.)

5. The "gringo" as he is often called here in Panama will continue to receive harassment, whether he lives in Panama or the present Canal Zone. The United States has been a rather convenient whipping-boy for the Republic of Panama for years and years. Criticism of the U.S. has always been used to distract the Panamanian public's attention from the incompetence, graft, corruption, and poor judgment of the Panamanian government. Besides, the average Panamanian, (when he permits himself to talk freely), does NOT want a treaty signed under the regime of Omar Torrijos. Such a treaty would reinforce the already crushing power of the Torrijos government on the Panamanian people.

6. The economic growth of Panama will need more than a Canal to restore it to health. The repressive atmosphere has inhibited consumers from visiting stores and businesses; it has inhibited investors from putting their money to work in Panamanian enterprises. The acquisition of Canal Zone lands for use by Panamanian commercial interests still requires the intelligent use and exploitation of those lands by competent businessmen. Such people are not the ones in control in the Panamanian government today. The ones in power are military men without adequate training in economics and business management.

7. The denial of basic human rights within the Republic of Panama IS a matter that should be considered in the treaty negotiations. President Carter has expressed repeated interest in the matter of human rights. If our country is to participate in a metaphorical "marriage" by means of a treaty with another country, we should know just who that "spouse" is. Denial of human rights is bound to make further problems for Canal employees later on, no matter WHAT nationality they are. Rather than taking an amoral stance, our country should apply its influence on the Panamanian government, to the extent that U.S. citizens (who do come under the legitimate concern of our federal government) will not be permitted to live under such repression. We cannot rightfully interfere in the domestic policies of another nation, but we can let them know that they will not receive what they want so desperately from us until they make some changes in those policies.

8. The State Department is negotiating a treaty which it is willing to ratify. They make the assumption that they know what is "in the best interest of the United States" and that all other opinions are to be considered ill-informed, unenlightened, and out of step with modern times. It is our sincere hope that the U.S. Congress will give long and hard consideration to all the factors of a new treaty with the Republic of Panama. The very unstable condition of the Torrijos regime condemns this proposed "marriage" to eventual separation or divorce in a very short time.

For ourselves as U.S. citizens living and working thousands of miles from our homeland, we can say, "Pack up tomorrow. We're ready to go." But for the sake of U.S. commerce and of U.S. national interests in general in the hemisphere, we urge you to examine the proposed treaty (whenever it is announced) thoroughly. We urge you to visit here for more than three days, to observe the situation with your own eyes and not to depend solely on briefings by U.S. or Panamanian government officials. The new treaty with Panama will have long-range repercussions that coming generations will have to live with; we urge you not to ratify a new treaty solely because the State Department says that it is the cure-all to problems with Panama. Russia and Cuba are waiting to see which way the treaty issue goes. A hasty decision on the part of our Congressmen without giving deep and thoughtful study to the question would please them very much.

Mr. ALLEN. I am now delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. GARN. Just for a brief comment. Earlier today when Senator Gravel was discussing human rights and saying there was nothing really going on, people were not being arrested on the streets down there, he is correct right now. Senator Baker and I met with five members of the Panmesta Party, some of them part of the Arias' government that was overthrown just after it was legally elected in 1969. I asked them why do they dare to meet with us. They said, "Oh, because we are on a holiday. Since the treaties were signed, Torrijos is being very nice and we enjoy it. So discuss those treaties for a long, long time. He is trying to impress you Senators."

Each one of them had been imprisoned at various times, one of them as many as seven times in solitary confinement with no charges made ever, just picked up off the street, and political parties were outlawed by Torrijos. They do not exist legally at all. But it was rather interesting. They were enjoying the whole process. "The first time we had freedom from being picked up on the streets and arrested, held incommunicado, and not charged, since September 7." What they said is that "We are afraid whether you sign the treaties or not, or ratify them, that as soon as it is decided then we are going to be in trouble again."

So they described it very accurately as "We are enjoying a holiday from human rights violations right now."

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for this most interesting information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I rise today to express my opposition to both Panama Canal Treaties. I commend the distinguished majority leader for offering two clarifying amendments concerning our right to intervene unilaterally to defend the canal and our right to priority passage for our vessels during emergencies, but I do not believe these rights will be unequivocally secure without a continued American military presence in Panama and they will not change my vote. Second, I do not believe that the treaties assure that the canal will remain open, secure, and well run during the proposed transitional period. Finally, I believe the financial aspects of the treaties are unacceptable and I simply cannot justify voting for huge expenditures, which could amount to as much as $10 billion by December 31, 1999, according to the State Department, without having all the implications clearly spelled out.

Militarily, I do not believe that we can be assured, under the current treaties or clarifying amendments, that we can defend the canal at a reasonable price, keep the canal in operation, and protect our strategic interests. Numerous military officials have testified that a continuing American presence in Panama, after the year 2000, is both necessary and desirable. For example, Adm. Thomas H. Moorer, USN, retired, stated before the Armed Services Committee:

I believe a permanent U.S. presence in the Panama Canal Zone to be the only feasible and safe posture for all of the nations of this hemisphere.

Maj. Gen. George L. Mabry Jr., USA, retired, stated that the United States "should retain the right to operate some bases and remain in the canal under a status of forces type agreement" and that these bases "would enhance our ability to operate and defend the canal on a unilateral basis if the United States deems such action as necessary." He also pointed out that a continued American military presence would give the United States leverage over Panama during a major dispute and would enable our Government to "apply levels of pressure against Panama to encourage better cooperation."

Even some of those officials who support the treaties admit, by implication, that a continued American presence would make it easier and less costly—in terms of lives as well as dollars—for the United States to defend the canal after the year 2000.

Should the treaties be ratified, there remains the possibility of internal civil strife in Panama that would disrupt the operation of the canal. As Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Jr., commented, many of our OAS allies see the possibility of Communist subversion as real and all members of the Inter-American Defense Board have "expressed reservation about the fact that the United States will no longer be in Panama. * * * Once we do not have the bases there, then the entire area becomes destabilized."

The treaty is also inadequate over the transitional period. With the disappearance of Canal Zone institutions like the police and the courts, it should come as no surprise that many polls indicate many skilled American workers in the zone will leave. While actual operators may well remain, it is likely that many—if not a majority—of company administrators will depart. I believe that Panama, boasting a commendable 80-percent literacy rate, can find skilled operators, who can successfully maintain the canal's daily technical operations. But I do have serious doubts about the Panamanian Government's commitment to managing the canal professionally and efficiently, to replace the current administrators without so politicizing these jobs that the efficiency of the canal is jeopardized.

Let me state that this is a very serious concern, and not simply a justification of my position. General Torrijos already has more than 3 dozen relatives on the government payroll and the Government of Panama has a bleak record in managing other public enterprises—to wit, the phone and power companies, the new airport, the new convention center, the Bayamo hydroelectric project. The overriding reason for these failures is bad, dishonest, corrupt management—not lack of skilled or trained technicians. This track record certainly does not give one much hope for responsible management of the canal. And, since the canal's economic situation is fragile, as we saw in the deficits incurred from 1973 to 1976, there is little margin for covering poor judgment or graft. The upshot, as I see it, is an unacceptably high risk of inefficient management and permanent U.S. subsidies to keep the canal open, not a guarantee for continued access to an open, free and secure canal.

Financially, I believe that those costs which we can estimate are too high, based on information we have at hand. Gov. Harold R. Parfitt outlined the various kinds of cost impacts the treaties could have. The figures he noted are as follows:

Early retirements—$165 million.

Defense construction costs—$43 million.

Payments to Panama out of Commission revenues—$2 billion.

Current value of the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone assets—$4.6 billion.

Value of all assets, at current prices—$10 billion.

Furthermore, there are other costs we cannot estimate—partly because of the lack of implementing legislation and partly because of ambiguities in the treaty. These costs would push the bill for the American taxpayer up even higher. This is unacceptable to me and the majority of the citizens I represent. A number of my colleagues have already raised this issue and I do not wish to belabor the point. Nonetheless, I am constrained to join these voices and state that it is absolutely vital that we know—and that those people whom we represent know—precisely what we are voting on.

Elmer Staats, Comptroller General of the United States, made this point clear in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee, stating that there will be other treaty related costs we cannot estimate that will be born by U.S. Government agencies, but we do not know what these will be since "only sketchy details are available at this time." Mr. Staats stated further:

That the treaty implementing legislation is the key determinant of the financial viability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission.

And—

We did make an effort to obtain that implementing legislation, even in draft form, because we thought it would be helpful to us, but we were unable to obtain it.

He further noted:

If I were a Senator, I would want to see the legislation before I voted.

Well, I am a Senator, and I do want to see that before I vote. That is only fair to the American taxpayer and we should not ramrod down the taxpayer's throat future obligations which we cannot put a price tag on.

One example of our uncertainty is the disposition of possible surpluses over actual costs of services during the first 3 years of the treaty—which could theoretically be as much as $15 million. Will this be applied to reducing the annual $10 million payment during the following 3-year period, will it be returned to the commission, or will it become a hidden subsidy to the Panamanian Government? Another question concerns the annual interest payment to the U.S. Treasury from canal revenues on the U.S. investment in the canal. Amounting to some $20 million annually, the discontinuance of the interest payment would be a considerable revenue loss for our Government and I understand that the administration intends that this be stopped. This would mean a loss of $450 million in revenues to our Treasury over the 23-year life of the treaty. There is also the large question of whether the United States—directly or indirectly—will be asked to make up deficits if there are inadequate revenues to cover debts incurred by the proposed canal commission when the canal is turned over to Panama in the year 2000. With the canal's track record of operating deficits from 1973 to 1976 and the projections for deficits after 1984, this is a legitimate and serious issue which should be brought out in the open.

Before we in the Senate are asked to vote, these matters need to be resolved. Given the strong possibility—or at least toleration—of corruption and graft in the current Panamanian regime which we all heard about during the closed sessions of the Senate, I do not believe such loose financial arrangements are in the interests of our Nation and our taxpayers. And given the statement issued by various Panamanian officials concerning the amount of money they expect to receive directly and indirectly as a result of the treaties, the economic question becomes of great importance to that Nation as well. For if these expectations are dashed, there is a greater likelihood of instability in that country, with a resultant potential for threats to the continued efficient operation of the canal through subversive activities.

I can only conclude that the treaties were hastily negotiated, poorly negotiated and should be rejected. We in the Senate are to give advice and consent to treaties on the basis of full knowledge. We do not have that and this alone is reason for rejecting these documents. But, based on what I have seen so far, I believe the treaties should be rejected, and I intend to so vote.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, I yield to our distinguished colleague from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I congratulate and commend the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. Johnston), not only for his eloquence but for his sagacity and for his ability to put so much wisdom and such a devastating analysis of these treaties into so few words. He has summed up in about 5 or 6 minutes what some of us have spent several days in trying to point out to the Senate, and I commend him for this very fine analysis of the treaties, and for his statement that while he feels that the leadership amendments might possibly improve the treaties, it will not be sufficient to justify his casting his vote in favor of the treaties.

I would like to ask a further question of the distinguished Senator. Is this the first time that the Senator has stated a definite position with regard to his attitude on the treaties?

Mr. JOHNSTON. First of all, I would like to thank my distinguished friend for his kind comments.

I have spoken out on the treaties, though not on the floor of the Senate. I have spoken out at home and in various other ways. This is the first time I have spoken on the floor of the Senate. Frankly, my distinguished friend from Alabama, and other colleagues in opposition, have been doing such a splendid job I could not find much to add to what he has said. This is, indeed, however, the first time I have spoken on the floor of the Senate.

I think in the final analysis we have to look at these treaties from the standpoint of the United States and our basic interest. No one that I know of is contending that the 1903 treaty should remain intact, that the $2.3 million a year, as I recall the figure, that we pay to Panama is the last word, that we should hold them to that figure; that there are not other modifications in our arrangements with Panama that should perhaps be made.

What we are dealing with here is a finished document, finished in that it is complete in terms of what we are going to vote on here in the Senate, but which leaves large, gaping holes as to the implications of that financially, and as to the implications of it in terms of our right to use that canal.

It may be temporarily unpopular in Panama if we turn down these treaties. I am mindful of that. Frankly, I am disturbed about it. But when we get right down to it, if we approve these treaties there is no more guarantee that this treaty that we approve, if we do, would be the final word than there is that the 1903 treaty would be the final word.

Suppose we get to 3 or 4 years after ratification, if we should ratify, and the Panamaians say it is not enough; that continued American presence and membership on the commission is colonial; that the rest of the Americans have to get out? What do we then do? Then not only are we faced with the same situation, but we do not have control of the zone and we do not have an American military presence. Then we do not have that ability to defend the canal. That disturbs me greatly.

I do not see how these treaties, as written, are in the basic interests of the United States, and I do not think we should ratify these treaties.

I think what we ought to do is to go back to the negotiating table and address some of these considerations the Senator from Alabama has talked about and those that I have talked about. Let us try to get a treaty that is fair to the Panamanians, which gives them a bigger slice of the pie. This does not do that. It is a model of ambiguity, and it seems to me it is a treaty which does not protect the basic rights that we ought to have in the use of that canal.

It may breed much more trouble than we presently have, though it is designed to avoid that trouble.

We were continually told that American presence, the so-called colonial presence, in the Panama Canal Zone breeds contempt, hatred, and ridicule on the part of the Panamanians; that in this year of 1978 that is unacceptable.

Perhaps that arrangement can be modified somewhat.

Simply because there are some objections to the present treaty does not mean that we should be asked to swallow these treaties, which, in my view, do not give stability, economic predictability, nor the continued security and our right to use that canal, which I think are basic elements that any treaty should have with respect to Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator for a very compelling statement.

I would like to ask one further question. I know the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. Johnston) makes frequent trips back home to Louisiana, and that he consults there with his constituents. He appears before many groups of citizens in all walks of life.

I wonder if he has had the opportunity to touch base with them on the issue of the Panama Canal treaties.

What reaction has the distinguished Senator had from his constituents back in Louisiana?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have in fact had vast opportunity to touch base on this issue. Indeed, even when I did not seek to touch base, even when I was doing other things, they were touching base, they were sliding in, one might say, on this issue. The reaction of the people of Louisiana is that they feel very strongly in my State, and I think by an overwhelming margin, perhaps by a margin of 2½ or 3 to 1. This is not an issue which is mysterious to the people of my State or this country. It is not an issue which the average citizen can fail to comprehend or have an understanding of.

I would guess that almost everybody in this country knows what the Panama Canal is and knows its general history. They may not have read "The Path Between The Seas," as I have. They may not have attended the hearings. But it does not take a huge amount of study, it does not take years of training, it does not take a doctor's degree to understand basically what we are doing in these canal treaties.

I think my people understand it fairly well. They feel by overwhelming numbers, 2½ or 3 to 1, that these treaties are not in our interest.

I think there is something to be said for the collective judgment of the people of this country. I think we can tend to trust the collective judgment on an issue of this kind.

Mr. Allen. I certainly agree.

[Mr. DeConcini assumed the chair.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. This is not an issue of a complicated weapons system where the American people are to decide whether the AWACS control airplane should be sold to Iran, whether we ought to have cruise missiles or B-1 bombers. Those are technical questions which need great study.

This is a very simple, straightforward issue, and people of the country, I believe, understand the issue.

I am frank to say that I have no special knowledge that this is of such an esoteric nature, of such a difficult or technical nature, that my constituency cannot understand it. They understand it, and they feel the treaties ought to be rejected. I think people across this land feel the same way.

Mr. ALLEN. If they are rejected, would that not then still leave the opportunity for the negotiators representing the two governments to get together and work together on a treaty which, if it were drafted along the lines debate here in the Senate would indicate it should be drafted, might well be approved the next time it is submitted to the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I would hope so. I am not unmindful of the risk of turning this treaty down. I do not laugh that off. I do not say it is an inconsequential concern.

I have heard fears range all the way from riots in Panama to a new Vietnam war.

I do not think that will happen. I hope and pray it will not happen if we should reject these treaties.

But I do not think we can run American policy based on the shrillest voices of concern about what happens if the treaties are turned down. I have talked to some South American officials of other governments about how they feel about this treaty, and they are all united—not all of them; most of them are united in their official comments. Privately, they are not nearly so enthusiastic about the treaty as the signing ceremony would indicate.

More than that, I do not know that we have a whole proliferation of countries in South America that have a really, truly democratic system. If we did, then we might have a better idea about how the people down there feel. I do not know whether there is any way to satisfy any American presence against the most extreme voices of the so-called anticolonialism movement.

It is not colonial, in my view, for us to have a presence in Panama based upon a treaty, based upon our investment, our work, our blood, sweat, and tears. In my view, that is not colonial. It is according to the norms of international law. There is not a country in the world that does not recognize that treaty and that treaty has been recognized for over 75 years. So we are not there by force of arms.

We are not insisting that that treaty remain unabridged and unmodified. But if we are going to change that, if we are going to give up internationally recognized American rights, then I say let us do it in a manner consistent with our basic interests. These treaties do not recognize that basic American interest, in my view.

Mr. ALLEN. Again, I thank the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. Johnston). I assure him of my deep sense of gratification and reassurance that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has reached this decision, because I know the time and thought, the serious consideration that he gives to his positions on the issues that confront the people of Louisiana and the people of the United States, that come before us here in the U.S. Senate. I know how highly regarded the distinguished Senator from Louisiana is among his colleagues in the Senate, many of whom lean heavily upon the advice of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

I know of his closeness to the leadership. I know that he has served with distinction as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, and I know that he is close to the Senate powers who are seeking to obtain Senate advice and consent to these treaties. So may respect and admiration for the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, already very high indeed, has greatly increased, I might say escalated, as a result of this independent decision that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has reached.

I believe it might well be the turning point in this body, because there are a number of uncommitted Senators, I read in the press and here on the electronic media. I might say I have not asked a single Senator how he is going to vote on the treaties. I feel it is my responsibility to take a position that I believe in and that I believe the people of Alabama believe in, but I do not believe it is my responsibility to solicit votes among Senators. I do know that many Senators regard the distinguished Senator from Louisiana so highly that it is bound to affect the ultimate decision that they make on this issue.

Again, I commend and congratulate the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank my distinguished colleague from Alabama for those kind and overly generous remarks.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT SUBMITTED

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to make a few brief comments on several statements of concern raised by two of my distinguished colleagues, Senator Brooke and Senator Stennis. Both of these able statesmen chose to draw attention to the financial issues embodied in these treaties.

Mr. President, on September 30, 1977, I wrote the Comptroller General of the United States. In my letter I told him, and I quote:

After careful analysis of available data on the Panama Canal Company, I am unable to conclude with any degree of confidence that the proposed treaty assures sufficient revenues to fulfill the obligations and services of running such an operation.

We requested a statement of projected annual costs and revenues. We wanted a breakdown on costs running the gamut from police and fire protection to commitments on maintenance and repairs on the channels, harbors and locks.

It was immediately apparent to me that we might be promising the Panamanian people one thing, but what we were eventually delivering would bear little resemblance to their expectations. I cannot duplicate any thought more than the succinct comment by my distinguished colleague, Senator Brooke, when he said:

Indeed, it is not inconceivable that passage of the treaties, with gross ambiguities regarding likely financial outcomes, could lead to an exacerbation of tensions rather than a lessening of the same in a relatively short period of time.

I would like to mention that I have not received a statement of projected annual costs and revenues from the General Accounting Office. However, I have carefully reviewed Mr. Staats' comments delivered before the Senate Armed Services Committee on this crucial topic. The distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Mr. Stennis, has now presented these financial concerns before this body. I commend his committee and him personally for this excellent review and analysis. And, I join with him in urging all of my colleagues to read both the committee staff study and the State Department comments. When Mr. Stennis tells us that this treaty could cost the American taxpayer upward of $2 billion, then this issue is certainly worthy of our attention.

Additionally, we have only received general observations on a complete estimate of the budget impact of the treaties from the Congressional Budget Office. Apparently, as has been mentioned innumerable times before my fellow colleagues, we cannot make an accurate assessment of costs and revenues, partially because implementing legislation which has been promised us months ago, has not been forthcoming.

Now, I recognize that there are many contingencies involved in an assessment of this magnitude. However, I find it very difficult to believe that after some 13 or 14 years of negotiations, we do not have an indepth financial analysis of projected deficits, or profits, if any.

Mr. President, last year the State Department assured me there would be no need for appropriations to cover any possible deficits—that toll increases would sufficiently cover any expenses. After reexamination, the administration admitted that there would possibly be cause for appropriations of additional funds to meet the requirements of the treaties. And, now, we are looking at figures which suggest enormous appropriations may be needed. I would like to respectfully suggest that when the administration tells us it will not cost the taxpayers any money, they are assuming the American taxpayer is not intelligent enough to know that we are not going to be writing out checks to the Government of Panama. They must underestimate our citizens. The average citizen in this country does know that his tax dollars, in one form or another, will be expended to meet the obligations the United States has promised in these treaties.

Mr. President, I received a letter signed by the President of the Panamanian Association of Business Executives urging my support of these treaties. I would like to quote a few sentences from that letter.

One can objectively state in regards to Panama that few countries have given you so much in return for so little.

They further tell me:

We have to tell you frankly that there is a lot in that Treaty (that) is objectionable and even humiliating from our standpoint.

While I do not agree with these views, these are private businessmen in Panama that want these treaties because they believe they are in the best interests of their country. I understand their patriotism. But, I worry when they tell me that unless these treaties are ratified they could not stop violent means such as terrorism and sabotage against the canal. And, I believe them when they tell me that should radical actions take place—

Panama will welcome all the help it could get from any country in the world.

I cannot help but believe that they will be even more distressed and frustrated when they find that services they have become accustomed to may deteriorate or disappear, and promises they believe have been made, may not be forthcoming.

I totally agree with Senators Brooke and Stennis, and others who have spoken out on this issue, that we must all know, once and for all, what financial obligations the United States must assume to carry forth the terms of these treaties.

We must not be faced with a situation in 2, or 5, or 10 years, when we are asked to appropriate vast sums of money to meet these treaty obligations, and take a chance on the appropriations being reduced or denied. If we are worried about sabotage and rebellion in Panama now, while they have many financial benefits, then we must surely consider the possible future repercussions that will exist when the financial stability of this enterprise is in jeopardy.

To conclude, Mr. President, I am very pleased to hear the concerns raised before this body on the financial aspects of these treaties. I cannot be party to any instrument which raises the hopes and dreams of both Americans and Panamanians, and then dashes these expectations to pieces. If Panama does not believe we were honest in 1903, then let us at least be honest in 1978.

Thank you.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of September 30, 1977, to the Comptroller General be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 30, 1977.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
General Accounting Office,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: After careful analysis of available data on the Panama Canal Company, I am unable to conclude with any degree of confidence that the proposed treaty assures sufficient revenues to fulfill the obligations and services of running such an operation.

As I understand the financial aspects of the Canal operation, the negotiations were conducted on the premise that any entity established to operate the canal would be self-financing over the life of the treaty. Therefore, we would like to request a statement of projected annual costs and revenues under the proposed treaty—a statement reflecting the expected annual expenditures required to meet the treaty obligations. We would appreciate a breakdown on costs running the gamut from police and fire protection costs, wages, etc., to commitments on maintenance and repairs of channels, harbors and locks.

At this point in time we are unable to determine what annual costs may be recovered, how the present assets will be depreciated and whether these assets will reduce any costs, or how deferred payments will be managed. Accordingly, I would hope that you would employ the resources of your office to conduct a thorough review of the financial condition of the Panama Canal Company (and Canal Zone Government), and furnish me with a breakdown of anticipated costs and revenues under the proposed Panama Canal Treaties. Thank you for your assistance and cooperation.

Sincerely,

PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senator.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The Senate continued with the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Inasmuch as many Senators who are not on the floor will doubtless read the Record tomorrow, I would like to state that the modification of amendment No. 40, which is pending before the Senate, to which the distinguished majority leader referred is as follows: That whereas the amendment authorizes that the President, if he deems it necessary for the defense of the canal or for maintaining its neutrality, may continue the military presence of the United States beyond December 31, 1999.

Now, the criticism has been offered here on the floor today that this amendment just would confer this right in perpetuity, just like the neutrality amendment is in perpetuity. To answer that criticism, the modification provides that the military presence, if the President deems it necessary for the defense of the canal, preserving its neutrality, to continue the military presence beyond December 31, 1999, he can do so, until December 31, 2019, which would add 20 years into the next century rather than a grant of this right in perpetuity.

So it would be 22 years under the Panama Canal Treaty and then the President could extend that time under my amendment for 20 years into the next century which, as I see it, would supply an omission in the leadership amendment, since under the leadership amendment the right to defend beyond the year 2000 would be a defense after all of our troops had been moved out of the Panama Canal Zone as required by the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, of course, I do not know how the magic figure of 20 years came about. But, in any event, it would have the purpose of extending the military presence in the Canal Zone which is there now and which, under the Panama Canal Treaty, would remain there until December 31, 1999.

So, in effect, the Allen amendment, as modified, and I say this with all due respect to my friend from Alabama, the effect would simply be to kill both of the treaties, for that matter.

It would certainly require renegotiation of the Panama Canal Treaty which requires the cessation of U.S. control of the zone by December 31, 1999, and it would also negate or, at least, it would require a renegotiation of the Neutrality Treaty as well, which provides, when the leadership amendment is adopted, for the guarantee by the United States of access and use of the canal after December 31, 1999, and for the expeditious transit of military vessels of the United States after December 31, 1999.

So I hope Senators will see that although the amendment, as modified, which has been offered by the very distinguished, very able, very skillful, Senator from Alabama, looks good on its face and it sounds good, is indeed a killer amendment.

We have heard of killer satellites. This is a killer amendment, and Senators ought to know that before they vote on it.

It will have the effect of killing both of these treaties and requiring the complete renegotiation of both of them.

So it would be for that purpose that I shall move to table the amendment. So let the Senators read the Record, as Mr. Allen says, and also be fully knowledgeable of the impact and the result and the effect of the amendment, as modified, by Mr. Allen were it to carry.

Mr. ALLEN. May I have the floor?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I will be glad to yield to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, I do not foresee the dire effect that the distinguished majority leader is picturing if this amendment should be agreed to. When it was first discussed here on the floor the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) branded the amendment as superfluous and unnecessary, and he stated at that time that whatever could be done under the amendment could be done under the leadership amendment.

I recognize he has changed his view on that and he says now that it might have the dire results that the distinguished majority leader has outlined. I do not see it that way. I think it might well be that Panama might be willing to allow the President in his discretion—it does not make it necessary that he do so, mandatory that he do so—I think the Panamanians might well welcome continued defense by the United States on the scene of the canal, and I do not feel that it would result in the defeat of the treaties.

Besides, whose interests are we looking out for? Are we looking out for the interests of the United States in defending the canal, or are we trying to shape this treaty in a manner that would be acceptable to Dictator Torrijos?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I have heard that song sung and sung and sung by the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is going to hear it some more, too.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator undoubtedly will, but I refute every word of it.

I am acting in the interests of the United States just as much, in my viewpoint, as the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I am sure the Senator is.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. For him to repeatedly stand on this floor and say what we ought to do is to look out after the interests of the United States—

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD [continuing]. And not after the interests of the Dictator Torrijos—I could not care less about Torrijos. I could not care less about him.

Mr. ALLEN. I know you could not care less about him.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And I could not care less about his interests.

I am just as dedicated to the interests of these United States as is the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator whoever came from the State of Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not dispute that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So this business of trying to paint, with a broad brush, that anybody who opposes the Allen amendment is not looking out after the interests of the United States, that he is looking out after the interests of Dictator Torrijos, is pure “BS,” pure “BS.” And I think it is about time somebody just stated it exactly for what it is.

The Senator has said time and time again—I have heard that same old theme—that we ought to be looking out for the interests of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. I will say it again.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator from Alabama is looking out for the interests of the United States, but so is the Senator from West Virginia, and so is every Senator who supports these treaties. I am not going to question by implication the patriotism of any Senator in this body, whether he is for these treaties or against them.

To stand here and say that any Senator in this body puts the interests of Dictator Torrijos ahead of the interests of the United States—the Senator knows that that is a false charge. He knows that that is a false charge, either explicit or by implication, and he knows the only inference that can be drawn from that is exactly as I have stated. He knows that is an unfair and unjust charge to make.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not impugned the Senator’s patriotism or the patriotism of any Senator.

But when the attitude is expressed by Senators to whom I have talked that no amendment, no matter how constructive or beneficial to the interests of the United States, will be accepted if it calls for a plebiscite, another plebiscite, down in Panama, then it is time to start worrying about whether the treaty is being shaped by the dictator from Panama or whether it is being shaped here by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Can the Senator from Alabama name one Senator who has said that, who has said that, regardless of the interests of the United States——

Mr. ALLEN. No; I am not saying, “Regardless of the interests of the United States.”

I asked a leading Senator if he would be willing to consider and possibly vote for constructive, substantive amendments, to the treaty, and the response was that he would vote for no amendment that would call for a new plebiscite.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator has changed his statement.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I have not.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I bet him my shirt that these two statements that he has just made are not exact.

Mr. ALLEN. In what way?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. In the earlier statement, if I recall, the Senator was portraying certain Senators here as saying to him that they would vote against any amendment to the treaty even if such amendment were in the best interests of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. No; the Senator is misquoting me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I do not mean to misquote the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not say that it was against the best interests of the United States.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I asked if he would support a constructive, substantive amendment, and he said only if it would not cause a new plebiscite in Panama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Would the Senator allow the reporter to read back his entire statement, his first statement?

Mr. ALLEN. That is all right.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I do not want to misquote the Senator. If I have misquoted him, I would like to apologize on the Record.

Mr. ALLEN. While we are waiting for that, we will go on, if it is agreeable to the Senator.

I see an attitude here, and that is what I am trying to work against, that as soon as the leadership amendment is agreed to, it is going to be mighty hard to get another amendment adopted, no matter how constructive that amendment is.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The majority leader has never said to the Senator from Alabama or to anybody else that his mind was closed to any and all amendments other than leadership amendments.

Mr. ALLEN. We will see what will take place.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We will see, yes. But no Senator can claim a monopoly on patriotism and service to the interests of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is twisting my words, and he is not stating my attitude with regard to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, who unquestionably is a great patriot. I do not charge a lack of patriotism to any Senator in the Chamber.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I would hope not.

Mr. ALLEN. I have never done that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We hear this thing over and over again, and I think I heard the Senator say the same thing in essence on television yesterday morning. Maybe I am wrong. I have heard him so much on this floor make the charge that certain Senators seem to be more interested in serving the interests of Dictator Torrijos than the good interests of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not say "serving the interests," but I have said making the treaty acceptable to Mr. Torrijos, Dictator Torrijos.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Perhaps we are talking in semantics, but I think the Record will show that the Senator has from time to time—

Mr. ALLEN. I also pointed out an example of how Torrijos has influenced the shaping of the treaty; and if the Senator would like me to recount that, I would be glad to do so.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator will say that the Foreign Relations Committee heard from Torrijos that if it did not put these amendments after articles IV and VI, respectively, and provided a new article, such and such would happen. And he has then sought to leave the implication that the Foreign Relations Committee acted at the dictation of or in the interests of General Torrijos. Well, these are statements that simply do not stand up.

The Senator has a perfect right to vote against the treaty and offer all the amendments he wants to and to speak against the leadership amendment, deride the leadership amendment, point to flaws in the leadership amendment. That is perfectly all right. I would never question the patriotism of the Senator from Alabama. He is acting in what he thinks is the best interests of the United States. But, by the same token, those of us who support these treaties and those of us who are opposed to the amendment by the Senator from Alabama are just as patriotic. We love our country as much as he does.

Mr. ALLEN. I know that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And we are not a bit more beholden to Dictator Torrijos than the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Senator, instead of telling what I was going to say about the action of the Foreign Relations Committee, let this Senator explain what was stated here on the floor of the U.S. Senate by a member of that committee, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin)?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes; who voted against the treaties.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, he did, but I do not believe that the fact that he voted against the treaties would cause him to utter an untruth on the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator is not implying that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Oh, no, indeed; a hundred times no; a thousand times no; a million times no. Never let it be said. [Laughter.]

I just want to say for the record that he——

Mr. ALLEN. That would make him a fabricator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No.

Mr. ALLEN. I just wonder why the Senator made that statement.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I certainly did not mean to imply that. What good does it do to have a vocabulary of 10,000 words, if we cannot say "No"? And I say, "No, a thousand times no."

I did not mean to interrupt.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

What the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), who was the one Senator who voted against the treaties in the Foreign Relations Committee, said was that the Foreign Relations Committee approved the leadership amendment, the substance of the leadership amendment, in the form of a new article or articles; that after that action was taken by the Foreign Relations Committee, the State Department complained to the Foreign Relations Committee, stating that they did not feel that that would be acceptable to the Panamanians; that adding a new article would be different from merely amending the treaties; that amendment of the treaty would not call for a new plebiscite; whereas, the Panamanians felt that the addition of new articles would result in a new plebiscite which for some reason the Panamanians do not want.

Therefore, they asked the Foreign Relations Committee to retrace their steps and to revoke the action that they had taken before to report out the leadership amendments in the form of a new article or articles and go back and amend articles IV and VI which the committee proceeded to do.

So that is one evidence, as I see it, that the Panamanians are having great influence as the Senate gives its advice and consent to the treaties. That is one illustration.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished whip.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to comment on this particular discussion since I was in Panama at the time that all of this occurred.

I was in a meeting with the maximum leader, General Torrijos, with other members of the Senate delegation. This was down there at the time the Foreign Relations Committee took its action which was on a Friday. On a Saturday our delegation met with General Torrijos and the two negotiators who had negotiated with the United States and with his foreign minister. They stated that the substance of what had been done by the Foreign Relations Committee which was to incorporate into the treaty the exact terms and language of the Carter-Torrijos joint statement which gives us the right to protect the neutrality of the canal forever, forever, and that gives us the right to have our ships go through first at the head of the line in times of emergency from our point of view, that all—

Mr. ALLEN. It does not say from our point of view. It says in the event of an emergency. That is one of the defects in the amendment.

Mr. CRANSTON. That is fine. In the event of an emergency. I think we would decide—I know that we would decide.

Mr. ALLEN. That is not stated in the amendment.

Mr. CRANSTON. Anyway—

Mr. ALLEN. Excuse me for interrupting.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There is plenty of time for an understanding to be written into the resolution for ratification.

Mr. CRANSTON. Absolutely, and I expect that will be done.

The exact substance of the language was acceptable to them. They stated they felt that if it was added as a new article under their Constitution and practices they would have to have a new plebiscite down there. They said they would like to avoid that. They explained various reasons why they would like to avoid it. Among the reasons are that it would be confusing to come back with a second plebiscite. It would be unnecessary since it had been clearly understood by the people and explained by the general before the vote that this was part of the treaty, and it was understood to mean that and he had made this joint statement with Carter and they had great expense involved in a plebiscite which they felt unnecessary, and they also having been through one plebiscite and coming back with another, they were not sure precisely what the outcome would be. If they had to go back it would have been very confusing.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CRANSTON. Senator Stafford, from Vermont, the Republican coleader of our delegation, and I thereupon communicated, I to Senator Byrd, Senator Stafford to Senator Baker, the minority leader of the Senate, that this was the view of Panama. We stated that in our view since the substance would remain in the amendment it would be advisable to cooperate to this extent and avoid imposing an unnecessary plebiscite on the people of Panama.

The Foreign Relations Committee decided by, I think, a 14-to-1 vote that that would be an equally sound course since it would not change the substance of the action nor the meaning of the action in any way; therefore, the Foreign Relations Committee also having similar advice from the State Department made that change, and that is now the form of the Byrd-Baker amendment that I am confident will be adopted by an overwhelming vote of the Senate.

I suspect even the Senator from Alabama will vote for the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I am a cosponsor of it if we get to it.

Mr. CRANSTON. That is fine.

I would like to say that I am one Senator who favors if we can the national interest of the United States to avoid imposing a plebiscite on the people of Panama by our actions in the Senate, that that is the wisest course in the interests of the United States.

I am concerned that if we adopt some amendment that the Panamanians felt is unacceptable and, therefore, they vote down the treaty that that will be adverse to the interests of the United States because I think this treaty mutually negotiated and hopefully mutually ratified and accepted is in the national interest of our country, and I share the patriotism of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from West Virginia and all other 97 Senators in terms of—

Mr. ALLEN. I never said anything to the contrary.

Mr. CRANSTON [continuing]. In terms of that point. It is not the interest of Panama, it is not the interest of Torrijos, the dictator in Panama. It is not any interest except the best interest of the United States that I have in mind when I hope that we can ratify the treaty in a way that does not risk the ultimate defeat of the treaty by Panama by making it unacceptable to them which I think would do great harm to the national interest of my country.

Mr. ALLEN. May I inquire of the distinguished Senator if the account given by the Senator from Alabama, though not as complete, because he had no knowledge of the situation in Panama of which the Senator mentioned, was my account of the action of the Foreign Relations Committee at variance with the statement made by the distinguished Senator from California?

Mr. CRANSTON. I think the account of the Senator from Alabama was accurate. I think the implications that he read into those facts was quite different than what the facts justified.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. What the Senator from Alabama said is correct; is that right?

Mr. CRANSTON. Insofar as the factual account of what the Foreign Relations Committee did, yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, they did back up at the behest of the Panamanians conveyed through the State Department.

Mr. CRANSTON. They did not back up. They kept the entire substance of the Carter-Torrijos statement that gives us the right to protect the neutrality of the canal and the right to have our ships go through first.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CRANSTON. That was kept intact. There was no compromise on substance.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that there was a question whether there was a new article which might cause a new plebiscite or whether it was language added to an existing article which would not be a cause for it.

Mr. CRANSTON. That is right, and a new plebiscite is to be avoided if possible because a new plebiscite——

Mr. ALLEN. I am sure of that.

Mr. CRANSTON [continuing]. Might cause the defeat of the treaty and damage the national interests of our country.

Mr. ALLEN. I see, and damage the Torrijos regime as well.

Mr. CRANSTON. I am not concerned about that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We are not concerned about that.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The distinguished Senator from Alabama likes to have his cake and eat it, too.

We are both, he and I both, and he and Senator Cranston—we all join hands in working for the best interests of the United States——

Mr. ALLEN. I am sure of this.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD [continuing]. In this instance.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not saying anything to the contrary. I respect the Senator's patriotism.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Not only patriotism but dedication.

Mr. ALLEN. I recognize that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. To the interests of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. I felt it, I say to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I say we are both equally dedicated.

Mr. ALLEN. Hard-hitting, I might say.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Hard-hitting, hard-slugging, hard-slugging dedication to the interests of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. I recognize that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But we do have honest differences as to what actions may in the final analysis be in the best interest of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And I do not fault the Senator from Alabama for differing with me on that. I simply must take issue when he leaves the implication, and I want the reporter to read because if I misconstrued the Senator's statement I want to apologize if I got the wrong impression, but I got the impression that he has been saying that there are Senators here who, in effect, are more interested in doing Mr. Torrijos' bidding than they are in doing what in their view is in the best interest of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator left that implication he would certainly be anxious to apologize. No such implication was intended.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Sure.

Mr. ALLEN. But I will accept the challenge of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia that the reporter might read the remarks of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It is not a challenge. I simply want to apologize if I have in any way misconstrued the Senator's statement.

Mr. ALLEN. I am ready.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to ask that one other thing be read. When the Senator from Alabama stated something to the effect that this was in the interest of the dictator of Panama, Mr. Torrijos, General Torrijos, and I said no, it was taken not in the interest of Panama or the dictator but in the interest of the United States, my country, did not the Senator from Alabama at that point, "Oh, I see," as if this was a surprising revelation to him that this action was taken in the interest of the United States and not in the interest of Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the Senator is kind of splitting a few hairs.

Mr. CRANSTON. Did the Senator say "Oh, I see," when I made that statement?

Mr. ALLEN. I rather believe I did.

Mr. CRANSTON. Then we do not have to have the Record read. It stands for itself.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now, if we might have the reporter read.

Mr. ALLEN. I hate for the distinguished Senator from California to split hairs certainly.

Mr. CRANSTON. Oh, I never do that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There has been a lot of hair splitting, just so long as it does not get down to hair pulling it will be all right.

Mr. CRANSTON. You cannot do that with me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now, Mr. President, if the reporter would read the words back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The official reporter will read the remarks of the Senator from Alabama to which the Senator from West Virginia has referred.

The Official Reporter of Debates (Mr. William D. Mohr) read as follows:

Besides, whose interests are we looking out for? Are we looking out for the interests of the United States in defending the canal, or are we trying to shape this treaty in a manner that would be acceptable to dictator Torrijos?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Who said that?

The OFFICIAL REPORTER. Mr. Allen.

Mr. ALLEN. Go ahead. Read on. I asked the question.

The Official Reporter of Debates (Mr. William D. Mohr) read further, as follows:

Then Mr. Byrd and Mr. Allen were in colloquy.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I have heard that song sung and sung and sung by the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is going to hear it some more, too.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator undoubtedly will, but I refute every word of it. I am acting in the interests of the United States just as much, in my viewpoint, as the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So the Senator did use the words.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator, according to the record there, asked that question. If that is an implication that anyone is not trying to protect the interests of the United States as well, I would certainly withdraw the statement. But I certainly will not withdraw the statement that Mr. Torrijos, Dictator Torrijos, is having great influence in the shaping of this treaty, whether that be for the interests of Panama or the interests of the United States.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Well, that is an assumption of the Senator. No one can keep him from drawing that assumption. But certainly no one has to agree to that.

Mr. ALLEN. I think amendments are going to be weighed on the basis of, will this be acceptable to Mr. Torrijos? Will this call for another plebiscite?

Mr. CRANSTON. May I comment on that point?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes; I think it requires some comment.

Mr. CRANSTON. It is very interesting that we are dealing with a dictatorship, with a man called "maximum leader," General Torrijos; but it is not a question of what he will accept or not accept. He is total dictator, but the people, under this plebiscite, do have a right to vote, that is, a right to accept or reject the treaties.

He might say to us, "Fine, from my point of view," but he is worried about a vote of the people in a dictatorship. They apparently have a constitution where they have to ratify a treaty by a vote of the people. So it is how all the people of that tiny country will vote that is of concern to the dictator there, and becomes of interest to the Senate of the United States because we want a treaty that can be ratified, and can be ratified by the people of Panama, because then the national interests of our country, from our point of view, will be served.

Mr. ALLEN. May I ask the Senator if one of the factors he is going to consider as amendments come before the Senate is whether or not that amendment might possibly cause the calling of another plebiscite in Panama?

Mr. CRANSTON. I, of course, will consider that.

Mr. ALLEN. That is all I need to know.

Mr. CRANSTON. Because the effect of ratification or failure of ratification of a plebiscite there is a factor we must consider in this debate. We have had negotiated through four administrations, two Democratic and two Republican, a treaty that is basically what we began with at the beginning. Four administrations, two of each party, have approved the general thrust of this treaty, and the three of those Presidents now living, I think, support the basic thrust of this treaty. It is in the national interest of this country. It is not in our national interest if it is defeated by amendments designed to kill it.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank all Senators.

Mr. President, has morning business been closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it has not. Is there further morning business?
